PECULIARITIES OF THE MOON.

When Professor Pickering, the well-known American astronomer, startled the world with the recent statement that the moon was inhabited, and Dr. Crommelin in London bestirred a passing tremor with the thought that the lunar body might soon fall on our heads, a little philosopher and quite famous head of the government observatory at Bourges, France, M. Moreux, sat back and smiled (says a cable to the New York Tribune). Theodore Moreux happens to be a priest as well as a star gazer.

Pickering announced that his persistent observations of the moon proved there were strange changes on its surface and curious green and dark brown colors which looked suspiciously like vegetation. He ventured the opinion that if there was vegetation there must be animals and perhaps men. The world sat up and listened. People wondered if there could not be earth-moon communication. Europe was stirred along with the rest of the world. All except the Abbé Moreux, who picked up paper and pen, took out his reference books and started to answer Pickering with arguments he believed that worthy American astronomer somehow had overlooked.

According to Moreux, it is very difficult to come to any conclusions about the appearance of the moon, for in studying it there is a change every moment. Both the world and the moon are moving constantly, and the shadows cast by the sun on the moon's surface are changing shape as you look at it. Therefore a variety of changing shapes appears to the astronomer and he can not recall any one condition definitely. One can see the same spot on the moon from the same angle only once every 243 days. Therefore a man could spend his life studying one condition and not have time enough to come to a scientific conclusion. Even so, there are slight changes in the moon's position with relation to the earth, which means that an astronomer might never be able to find exactly the same set of conditions which would permit him to make an authoritative statement on the subject. M. Bigourdan, director of the National Bureau of the Hour, which is the government's Paris observatory, adds here that our atmosphere prevents and always has prevented all astronomers from making accurate observations of the moon. Given the agreement that for every scientific fact the same set of conditions must be studied almost an infinite number of times, it is evident, M. Moreux thinks, that Mr. Pickering could not have had sufficient data to back up the statements he made.

The little French astronomer-priest assumes in a lengthy thesis answering the California savant that it is generally admitted that there is practically no atmosphere on the moon; or, at any rate, only enough to depress the mercury in a barometer about three-quarters of a millimeter. That equals about the same amount of air that could be found in a pneumatic tube which is supposed to be devoid of air. Perhaps microbes could exist in such an atmosphere, but it is extremely doubtful. Further, under these conditions there is nothing to keep the sun's ultra-violet rays from penetrating to the surface of the moon, and there is no cellulose which can resist an ultra-violet ray. These rays are so strong that all bacteria must perish and all life dies if exposed to them for one minute. The day on the moon is equal to fourteen of our days, so, asks the French observer, how could anything live there subject to fourteen days of steady ultra-violet rays when one minute of such exposure would kill it?

The temperature on the moon is another point on which Moreux believes Pickering seems to have slipped up. It is agreed among scientists that with fourteen days of sunlight, untempered by any appreciable atmosphere, the temperature of the moon's surface would reach at least 392 degrees Fahrenheit of heat, and likewise during the fourteen nights of cold the moon cools down to a point around at least 328 degrees Fahrenheit below zero. What kind of life, he adds, could endure such heat and such cold and adapt itself every fourteen days to a change of over 700 degrees?

To delvers in musical history "The Beggar's Opera" is interesting because it fixes the date of the first use in public of the piano. At a performance in 1767 it was announced that a Miss Buckler would sing a song from "Judith," accompanied on a new instrument called the pianoforte, a novelty that was a strong drawing card.

The President and the Treaties.

President Harding takes high ground in the matter of the Conference treaties now before the Senate. He will "neither lobby, trade, supplicate, nor admonish" for their acceptance. Commissioners acting in conjunction with the President spent many weeks in the work of arranging these treaties. As written they represent the findings of intelligent and patriotic effort; they have gone to the Senate with the approval of the Executive. They stand upon their merits. The President has done his work and he will do nothing more.

There is dignity and force in the President's attitude; and in so far as it departs radically from recent executive policy, it is the more to be commended for that. In recent years we have had far too much of what may be styled executive electioneering in respect to matters not properly within the field of executive authority. This practice has at many points well-nigh revolutionized our system. It has added to the responsibilities of the executive. It has robbed the Senate both of its dignity and its authority. It has led to courses perilously near the line of executive bribery. In its various impositions it has cost the country vast sums of money. Mr. Harding is right. The treaties should stand on their merits.

For the Senate the President's announcement should have the effect of moral stimulus. With a revived sense of authority there should come a revived sense of responsibility. In the matter of these treaties the Senate holds in its hand the reputé of the government of the United States—its powers as well—in the sphere of international diplomacy. Confirmation of the treaties will go far to establish this country as a controlling force in world affairs. Rejection of the treaties will be a mark of the impotence of our government in its dealing with other countries. If these treaties, under the circumstances of their negotiation, shall not be confirmed, then it will be useless, or something worse, for us to attempt anything further in the line of international contracts. The world will sneer, and will be entitled to sneer, at a country that invites coöperation, gives direction to international councils, and then fails to ratify engagements of its own contriving. In brief, it is for the Senate to say if in future the United States shall be a leading force in international affairs or if it shall become the laughing-stock of foreign chancelleries. Various reservations are suggested to the treaties as they stand. No one of them adds anything to the force of the original documents. They add nothing to reservations made in the treaties themselves. They represent nothing but the spirit of stupid and mischievous meddling. The treaties ought to be adopted as they stand.

The position of Messrs. Borah, Reed, La Follette, Johnson, and other chronic objectors has not one leg of logic to stand upon. It is representative of nothing more or less than the hateful spirit of obstruction behind which lurk the inspirations of personal vanity and political calculation. These motives—mischievous, pestiferous, wholly unworthy—merit rebuke and they ought to find it promptly and emphatically at the hands of a Senate inspired by self-respect and solicitous for the dignity, the power, and the honor of the United States.

A Moral Issue.

When the cash bonus project was revived only a few weeks ago the first protest came from the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Mellon put the financial argument in terms plain and strong. But there was little response from the country. Dollar worshippers as Americans are often sneeringly declared to be by foreign critics, they never shirk an obligation. What America owes she can and will pay. It was not until the moral aspects of the issue were put before the public that it got popular attention. But from the hour that the moral enormity of the proposal was made emphatic public condemnation has grown until now it bids fair to estop the whole bad business. Where financial arguments were held negligible, moral considerations have aroused the country.

The gross manner in which the demand for a bonus is urged has stirred universal indignation. Under a thin camouflage of equitable pretense, an organization making parade of its voting strength has taken Congress figuratively by the throat. Unless the public treasury shall be opened to them, some three or four millions of men, it is declared, will drive the present members of Congress from their seats. The demand is, Stand and Deliver! We are in politics, say the Legion leaders, and we will not be denied! Only once before in the recent history of the country—when in 1918 the railroad brotherhoods "held up" the Wilson administration—has any issue been so brutally put before the government and people of the United States. The grossness of this demand has been matched by the pusillanimity of Congress, with hardly a pretense of other than a motive of political self-defense. There has been a preliminary surrender. A veritable wave of timidity—of cowardice—overwhelmed Congress and brought the bulk of its members two weeks ago to an attitude of shameful acquiescence to a shameless demand. If we may credit the expressions of Mr. Fordney, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the House of Representatives stood ready last week to yield consent that the doors of the treasury be opened and that the claimants be permitted to gorge themselves. This surrender was not in recognition of an equity, but as a bribe to an organization of remorseless raiders.

Curiously, among something more than five hundred members of our national legislature only three or four voices were raised in protest. The onslaught appeared for a time to have been successful. Congress stood trembling in its boots, whipped into acquiescence. It was at this point that the press of the country came to the rescue. Not always is it courageous or prompt; but in this instance it has risen to its duty in a manner that illustrates its power as it must surely stimulate its self-respect. The Argonaut is proud to have stood in the van of protestants with journals like the New York Times, the New York Herald, the Boston Transcript, and others of wide circulation and of great capability of impressing the public conscience. Many delinquents there have been—notably the Hearst papers—but the moral weight of those who have dared to speak out has overborne those who have cowered in fear of reprisals. The bonus project now stands naked—in its true character as an outrageous assault upon the financial fortunes of the country, and as a still more outrageous project regarded as a moral offense. By presentments irrefutable in their moral force and in their appeal to judgment, the people of the country have been stirred to realization of the crime contemplated and in prospect.

Tardily, Congress has been impressed with a sense of the delinquency of a surrender which it had all but put into effect. The Administration, from the first obviously conscious of the brewing mischief but lacking hardihood to meet the onslaught as it should have been met, has newly taken heart. The project has been halted. It now remains to be demonstrated if there abides in Congress and in the Executive branch sufficient strength to face the demand, as it will again be urged, with a stern "Thou shalt not!"

The Republican Party and Its Pledges.

In the year 1920, when the existing National Administration—President and Congress—was nominated and elected, the temper of the country was toward conservatism and economy in administration and in opposition to the Wilson foreign policy. The Republican platform declared that the party "will resist all attempts to overthrow the foundations of the government or to weaken the force of its controlling principles and ideals, whether these attempts be made in the form of international policy or domestic agitation." Here, summarized, we have the Republican appeal to the country, the appeal upon which the party was placed in power. Proceeding further, the Republican platform declared: "We undertake to end executive autocracy and to restore to the people their constitutional government." Here was a truly enticing pledge, one that found special favor with a people who had had more than enough of absolutism in the presidency. The remainder of the platform promises were in application to these fundamental planks.

A certain measure of progress has been made in carrying these promises into effect, but the full programme has not been enacted, while new and extraneous and expensive objects and proposals to Congress multiply, each furthered by its own particular bloc or group. The party into whose charge the government was given has not carried out its programme. The machinery seems inadequate to put into effect the promises that won a majority of seven million voters. President Harding has tried to make good the party pledges to the country, but he has tried in vain. His failure, in so far as he has failed, is due to the fact that the principle of party government has broken down. Explanation is in plain view. Each senator and representative who is up for reelection is anxious to do what a majority of the voters in his particular state or district want him to do. The few who are interested in legislation for the good of the entire country are in helpless minority. In brief, small politics, merely personal politics, has usurped the seats where statesmanship should abide. Party authority, the principle that from the foundation of the government until now has been a dependable force, no longer exists.

In the meantime Congress is in a state of perplexity, a condition which fairly parallels the state of the public mind. Under the theory of its recent practice, Congress desires to follow the country rather than to lead it. But it is confused by the jangle of diverse voices that beat upon its ears. Because it can not define the public mood, Congress can not make up its mind on the soldiers' cash bonus, the American valuation plan as opposed to the foreign valuation plan as the basis for tariff legislation, or on other controverted questions that are before the national legislature. Each little politician, anxious for reelection, seeks to avoid whatever may possibly give offense to anybody in his state or district. The result is that Congress has practically abdicated its responsibilities as they relate to the national welfare by shunting these issues upon the shoulders of the Executive.

President Harding came into office earnestly wishing to leave to Congress things that under the Constitution rest upon its authority. He thought he might rely securely upon the fact that in each branch of Congress there was a majority chosen, as he himself was, under the definite pledges of the Republican party. As directed by the Constitution, he outlined a programme based on the party pledges and he called upon the Republican members of Congress to carry out these pledges. The response has been disappointing; Congress, intent upon the local interests of its members, will not act upon its own initiative. It will be a pity, truly, if Mr. Harding shall have in the end to thrust to one side the ideals with which he entered the presidency, and if he shall be forced to resort, as his predecessors have done, to a species of "driving" not contemplated by the Constitution and warranted only, if at all, by the necessities of keeping faith with the country.

We hear the suggestion that, since blocs are the fashion of the day, there should be formed in Congress a party bloc devoted to carrying out the pledges upon which the party came into control of the government. A movement to this end would have the value of a moral basis and, as compared with the demands of geography and of special interests, a distinct moral authority. A group holding as the first of its responsibilities support of the Executive in carrying out the pledges of the party would surely have the respect of the country, and having it, could not fail to stand justified before the constituencies. There is that in the character of Americans which respects a man of his word, whether in politics or in other relationships. A group of men in Congress declaring their purpose to sustain by their acts the pledges upon which they were elected, even though a minority, would have a mighty influence upon legislation, and we venture the judgment that its members would lose nothing on individual account. Loyalty to principle, faithfulness to pledges, will unfailingly command approval and support where cringing subservience unfailingly falls into contempt.

A Modern Ulysses and His Bow.

Mr. Lloyd George, a man of no party, under constant fire of criticism at the hands of men of various parties, contrives year in and year out to hold his place as the head of the British government. Every now and again there develops some kind of movement to oust him, but he never gets ousted. Every now and again somebody bobs up cheerfully with the report that he is about to resign, but he never resigns. He continues to find practical support from many men of high position who cordially dislike him. The secret is that Mr. Lloyd George has talents and has attained a position matched by no other man in the contemporary life of England. Those who would like to see him cast down from his high place are not able to name any other man competent to the great task of the premiership at a time when not only England but the whole of Europe is in flux. Lord Gray, Lord Robert Churchill, Mr. Asquith, and a dozen others are now and again named tentatively in connection with the premiership; but even those who nominate them know in their hearts that the "come-down" from Lloyd George to any one of his suggested rivals would be pitiful, painful, even ridiculous. So Mr. Lloyd George goes on, holding his great post by the strength of an unrivaled personal power sustained by an unrivaled prestige.

The Genoa Conference.

It is not likely that the United States will be represented actively in the Genoa Conference, the purpose of which is to consider ways and means of rehabilitating Europe. We shall no doubt have an official "observer" there, but that is the length to which our participation will go. It is understood—though not yet announced—that this decision has been reached personally by the President after conference with members of his cabinet and upon the basis of careful study of the European situation.

It is Mr. Harding's conviction that we can not at this time be helpful in restoring political and economic stability in Europe, largely because any such attempt would inevitably land us in one or another of the opposing group camps in European politics. Our policy will be to move ahead as rapidly as possible in the refunding of debts owing to us by the European states, operating through the commission which has recently been appointed. These operations will be conducted one by one with the several debtor nations. President Harding's idea is to be generous, but not to the degree of prodigality, and to make settlements with a careful aim to preservation of American interests viewed in the broadest aspect. By this means, it is believed, we may help to relieve the European situation. Any other course would hardly be wise in respect of the fact that common ground for the United States and Europe is impossible in a situation where we are a creditor nation and all the others debtor nations. When the work of debt refunding has been accomplished, the United States will be in position to consider requests from Europe for aid in restoring economic, if not political, normality on that continent. When that time arrives, so President Harding broadly intimates, we shall not be unmindful of our world obligations.

While remaining aloof for reasons above suggested, the American government is profoundly interested in what shall be done by the Genoa Conference. Washington is not disturbed over reports regarding recent conferences between Lloyd George and Poincaré. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald reports, for example, that the two premiers have a definite understanding that the decisions of the Genoa meeting would be turned over for enforcement to the League of Nations. This may or may not be true. If true, it is in no way disturbing to established American policy. The government of the United States is not unfriendly to the League of Nations and not without hope that it may become an agency of large practical value in European affairs. But it is the view of the present Administration that the sphere of the League is Europe. If the League can become the instrumentality of bringing about such a relationship between the European states as their real interest requires, then the United States will be in position to be helpful in a large way. Europe now is convulsed, openly or under cover, by jealousies and controversies, and this fact is the most serious obstacle to rehabilitation. There must be some solidarity in Europe before the United States can help.

Editorial Notes.

The homely phrase which describes a hasty-tempered man as cutting off his nose to spite his face finds humorous illustration in the resignation of Professor Rieber of the State University because a location not to his liking has been selected for the projected campus "bowl." Now, time and sober-second-thought having cooled him down, Professor Rieber is giving an imitation of the man who, having jumped into a bramble bush and scratched out both his eyes, took second thought, and with all his might and main a second time jumped into the self-same bush and scratched them in again. No doubt a kindly administration will overlook a hasty act due to an overwrought temperament. Yet we can but wonder if one of so little poise is fairly qualified as an instructor of youth.

Those who were commissioned to select a site for the "bowl" took into consideration all the elements entering into the project, including accessibility for the public, convenience of students, cost of construction, etc. When all the considerations had been threshed out, choice was made of the Strawberry Cañon site. This judgment was concurred in by engineers and other experts and finally confirmed by the Board of Regents. It would seem, in the face of a determination so carefully worked out, that there ought to be no objection—certainly none that would warrant a professor of philosophy, who has no responsibility relative to matters athletic, in kicking against the traces and making a fool of himself. The plain English of the matter is that it was none of Professor Rieber's business. Further, his resignation in a fit of pique would seem the mark of a character deficient in an elementary sense of propriety.

In the news from South America we have evidence of the fact that the United States has no monopoly of the radical and pestiferous politician. A shining example of this type appears to be one Hipolito Yrigoyen, the "progressive" President of the Argentine, who in a recent election won against Señor Naon, a brilliant conservative who had a distinguished diplomatic career at Washington. Yrigoyen, it appears, is a man something after the Hiram Johnson sort—virile, unctuous—altogether a hellofaffeller. He has, it appears, established what the Argentinos term a "personalist policy." The phrase is illuminating. All observers of politics have noted that men of the hellofaffeller type, when they get into power, invariably establish a "personalist policy." Here, with a lesser measure of euphony, we have termed this sort of thing "building up a personal machine." "Personalist policy" is better. The Argentinos are to be congratulated upon contributing something of value to the lexicon of politics.

Truly a "scrap of paper" is the British announcement of retirement from the protectorate of Egypt. Under the reserved conditions Britain is still to hold Egypt in the hollow of her hand. Practically, the only withdrawal is that of certain military forces, with substitution of some names of things for other names. The Egyptians are to be subject, as heretofore, to British authority in all matters essential to the safety of the water route to India. This is not saying that England has acted gracelessly in the matter. No system possible to be established independently of Egypt would be able to protect that country from an external aggression. Furthermore, it is one of the necessities of the situation that the Suez Canal be held open. Protection alike of Egypt and the Canal must rest upon a power more potent than that of the Egyptians themselves. Under these conditions England must hold rein either loose or tight, as situations may demand, over Egypt.

In some respects the attitude of England toward Egypt is parallel to that of the United States toward Cuba. In one sense Cuban independence is a very real and vital thing, but all the world knows that there is a string to it. Whenever the Cubans fail, as they have done again and again, to direct their own affairs efficiently, we step in, take over affairs for a while, and straighten things out. If any other country were to assail Cuba we would go immediately to her protection. We do not assume to manage the affairs of Cuba so long as Cuba can manage them for herself. We don't demand revenues from her. We don't impose our laws upon her. None the less Cuba, in a broad sense, is under the dominion of the United States. So with Egypt in her relation to England; and so it must continue to be for an indefinite period.

There are situations in which strong nations must inevitably hold authority over weak nations. Japan's authority over Korea is a case in point. Whoever possesses Korea holds in suspense a sword over Japan. So long as the Koreans were independent and free from outside authority, Japan was safe. But when, twenty-five years ago, China undertook to move over upon Korea, Japan was compelled to intervene. She did intervene and whipped China back into her place. Then came Russia in an attempt at "peaceful penetration" with ulterior designs upon Korea. Again Japan, in defense of her own position, was compelled to interfere, and as history records she did it effectively. Then, under necessity of making herself secure in her island home, she took over Korea herself. Measured by moral standards, it was not altogether a righteous proceeding; and it was made worse by arbitrary and cruel methods of administration. The yoke was fitted too tight. The driving was too hard. The record stands as a reproach against Japan. None the less, under the rule of self-preservation, Japan's domination of Korea was a necessity, precisely as England's control over Egypt is a necessity, precisely as our control over Cuba is a necessity.

Among the latest suggestions for meeting economic objections to the cash bonus proposal comes one to the effect that certificates of "borrowing power" be issued in place of cash. Truly a happy thought, and one that will appeal to the note-shaving gentry of whom no city is so large or no hamlet so small as not to have its full quota. Does any one of practical sense doubt that if this suggestion shall be carried into effect fully half of the certificates will speedily find their way into brokers' offices upon terms decidedly advantageous to the note-shaving business?

Dr. John Casper Branner, dead within the week at his home at Palo Alto, was a man of noble attainments and of high character. He was a great teacher; and in the brief period of his service as president of Stanford University he illustrated administrative powers of high order. There was nothing spectacular about Dr. Branner. His instinct was that of quiet service. He both avoided and loathed all forms of self-advertisement. But when large duties were put upon him he carried them effectively and with dignity. No small part of Dr. Branner's achievements as a teacher was that he gave to Herbert Hoover his fundamental engineering training, with much else that became inspiring motives of Mr. Hoover's character and career.

On the part of old-time San Franciscans, memories of other days are revived by announcement of the death in Paris of Sylvain Weill, brother of the late Raphael Weill, and long associated with the mercantile life of San Francisco. It is many years since Mr. Weill's active life here and his return to his early home in Paris, but he retained always affectionate memory of his San Francisco associations. For many years it has been his chief pleasure to receive San Francisco friends at his home in Paris.

Under existing conditions it becomes a necessity for the United States, if she is to extend or to maintain her foreign commerce, to subsidize our merchant marine. Other nations are operating ships under this policy, and unless our ships are to be driven from blue water we must meet the competition. But the most serious handicap upon American shippers is our system of restrictive laws. American shipping men may not build or buy ships in the world's markets. They may not man their ships under advantages available to their rivals of other nations. In arranging for subsidies we ought concurrently to unshackle American enterprise upon the sea. Subsidies will help, but they make a poor substitute for freedom of action—for conditions unrestrained by whimsical and costly and vexatious restrictions.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Words of Sobriety and Wisdom.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 6, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Although a little late, I would like to have my say on the matter of the bonus. I enlisted in the navy and served some few months at Mare Island. My physical loss was nothing, but financially I was out a great deal, and when I return to my pre-service position I did not reap any war raises, for I went back at the same pay that I was receiving when I left. However, I do not consider that of any consequence, as I did not enlist with a view to financial reward. Therefore I am opposed to this bonus matter.

I know that our crippled and wounded veterans deserve unlimited aid and care. But to hand out money lavishly to able-bodied men would be the height of folly. A paid-up life-insurance policy would be far better, but I think that the real cure for most of our industrial troubles is work and economy.

And surely the incentive for such will not be found in the giving of a bonus by politicians. Let's all pull together for a greater nation, whose people seek only that which is gained by honest effort. Surely, in his heart, the really industrious veteran does not seek financial reward for services which duty demanded. I hope our politicians, law-makers, and executives will soon cease quibbling over a bonus and settle down to questions of greater import, such as care for cripples of the war, industrial development, and the final decision on prohibition, which under present conditions is worse than a failure in San Francisco.

JOHN J. WISE.

For Flag and Country—Not for a Bonus.

SOUTH BEND, WASH., February 19, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR: The main topic of the day is the soldier bonus. The more I read about it the more my American red blood boils in my veins.

So I say as an ex-service man, down with the bonus bill, and down with it to defeat. The nation is staggering with debts. What is the use of dragging our nation deeper in the mire?

I joined the colors to defend our flag and country. I am eligible to a bonus, if there be one. But I did not fight for bonus, but for our flag and country. I am going to fight the bonus with the same vigor and energy. This bonus must be settled once for all and must be defeated at any cost.

Personally, I thank your representative, Mr. McArthur, from the Third District of Oregon, for taking such a stand as he does, and I sincerely hope that the Congress will not be blindfolded when the members vote on this so-called bonus bill.

JOSEPH JANALIK.

Frederick Palmer on the Bonus

Mr. Frederick Palmer, well-known author and correspondent, who has seen more wars than any professional soldier alive, and who served with General Pershing during the entire period of the latter's service in France, writes a notable article on the bonus question in the New York Times of February 12th. Referring to the section of the bonus bill providing farms of government land for those who may choose this form of "adjusted compensation," Mr. Palmer says:

More is needed for success in farming than land. It is worse than useless to attempt farming without some capital—which few returned soldiers seeking government lands have—and especially without the knowledge and training of the farmer. The idea that any one can get a living out of the ground if he only has the ground is a delusion which has cost many a one dear. Farming is a business, which demands training and knowledge, just as carpentering does; only if the carpenter goes at his job untrained and ignorant, he does not get a second job, while the farmer owning his land can and must make one futile attempt after another before failure is decisive and ruinous. Still there undoubtedly are among the returned soldiers enough men with capital and experience sufficient to warrant giving them land if they wish it. So this provision of the bill may be allowed to pass.

Referring to the argument advanced by friends of the bonus that men who worked in government service at home in civil life received pay in most cases larger than that of those in the trenches, Mr. Palmer says:

This leaves out of sight the difference between the civilian and the soldier. The former worked under conditions strictly commercial; his wages were understood to be complete payment for his work. He may, like every noble laborer, have put more labor, thought, and devotion into his work than money could possibly repay, or, on the other hand, the wages he received may have been excessive. Both these considerations were outside the contract. He agreed to do a specific thing and to regard the specific sum he received as full compensation. Pay-day cleared scores with his job. But with the soldier it was different. The wages he received, though they were larger and his comforts greater than were ever provided for any army in the world, were only a part of his payment. By far the greater part lay in the honor accorded him, the honor given from a recognition of his loyalty, his facing of danger, his sacrifice of himself for others, the honor due to the defender of common liberties and the champion of the right. It is this honor which the nation lavished visibly on the burial of the unknown soldier, who was regarded as its recipient and its symbol. And now the advocates of the bonus propose that this shall be commuted into money. "Yes, we were heroes and all that," they declare, "but now we want to be paid for it. We prefer to take it in cash; $400 apiece will be about the market rate for heroism. That would settle things up and raise us to the level of the workmen in the shipyards. Let's have things squared."

But this argument cuts the ground from under itself and is therefore suicidal. The tribute of honor to the soldier is given because of his nobility in sacrificing himself for his country. But if he commutes his sacrifices for cash, those services are no longer unselfish and noble and he has therefore no claim to extra compensation for them; they have been included in the payment already made. He has in truth been crowned with a halo, a real halo of intrinsic and lofty worth, on the value of which his speeches in patriotic meetings are loud. It is consequently a depressing sight when one sees him going about peddling his halo or insisting that they shall be bought up wholesale. It is much as if a distinguished general, on the presentation to him of a sword in recognition of his services, should say that if it is all the same to the committee he would prefer to take it in groceries. The hero who has sold his halo for cash is not on the level of the civilian who never had a halo, but must take a lower place.

There are, of course, high-minded soldiers who feel all this and scorn the commercialization of their patriotism by a bonus. The American Legion itself apparently was at first of this noble mind, for at its organization it passed a self-denying ordinance expressly declaring that it would not go into politics. This action was then approved by Colonel Theodore Roosevelt. I have seen neither approval nor repudiation by him since of the action of the American Legion. One can imagine the fierce wrath of his distinguished father if the proposal had been made to him to pay him for his charge at San Juan.

The case may be put in a few words. The truly patriotic soldier stands on a higher level than the ordinary citizen. The American Legion is proposing to sell that level for cash. Considering the vast difference between the two conditions, it is surprising that they are willing to sell out for so small a price per head. If the bonus bill passes, the button of the American Legion will show, not the man who risked his life for his country, but will advertise its wearer as the man who sold his halo.

China until recently was the country of mothers-in-law, where they reigned and used their power to make martyrs of their daughters-in-law. One can not imagine to what point this ferocious authority was carried. But their good time is nearing an end; the young wives have liberated themselves in the Chinese Republic. The feminists of Canton have won a "glorious victory." First, there is no longer any marriage code. Second, the wife has the right to keep all she has earned. Third, the divorce laws are the same for the two sexes. It would be interesting to know what is thought of all this by the old mandarins with crystal or mother-of-pearl buttons.

In the industrial area in the Ural the twelve-hour working day has been introduced, together with a transition to job work. As a result of this the daily production of rolled iron has increased by 5000 puds; that is to say, it has reached the peace level. Henceforward it is proposed to work in three shifts so that the production can be raised to 6000 puds.

In 1621 James I conferred the titles knights and baronets of Nova Scotia on a number of Scotch adventurers whose object was to colonize North America.

THE USES OF EDUCATION.

There is a great deal of criticism nowadays drifting nebulously about the subject of education, which is neither pointed nor authoritative, and so has little value except to indicate the fact that our educational system has fallen under some suspicion, or at least into some vague disfavor, and that probably there is something about it that might be better if we could only find what that something is.

One thing undoubtedly wrong with it, and apparent even to the layman, is the tendency of our colleges and universities to become more and more like country clubs and less like institutions of real learning and general culture. Athletics has been raised to undue importance, and too much stress has been laid upon the advantages of seats of learning as nice places in which to spend the years of youth, acquiring as little scholarship as may be, and forming connections that may become valuable later when one is on the hunt for a good position in business and society.

Much of this has followed the development of a leisure class in America, and one that has not long been in a position of culture compared to such a class in Europe. Growing out of the increasing wealth of the country, following the civil war, has come a sentiment somewhat inimical to the slow processes of solid learning and the discipline arising therefrom, independent of the special requirements of the various vocations. The learning which should lie at the foundation of character, patient, thorough, broad, and deep, has, almost concurrently with the elective system, been largely sacrificed to sport and student ease.

The elective system, a generation ago, appeared to have some valuable attributes. It seemed to accord with liberty and individualism. But academic individualism is almost a contradiction in terms, and the exercise of liberty may well wait until one has at least reached years of discretion. Under the elective system, young persons were invited to choose their life work, at a time when they had little understanding of life and less of work. They were invited into a sort of Woolworth store of building materials, where they could acquire rafters and shingles and begin to erect the fabric of character, like the people in Swift's romance, from the roof downward. More recently we have had the destructive effects of the European war, when "campus activities" in behalf of victory absorbed undue amounts of the student's time, and became the excuse for neglected scholarship.

Under these conditions it is well that one of the great educators of the country, a man who stands for practical and sound citizenship as well as scholarly attainment, should endeavor to recall us to the real lamp of learning. No one who has followed his course in American life and American politics can accuse Nicholas Murray Butler of speaking or writing from the cloistered point of view. In his annual report for 1921, as president of Columbia University, the head of the great institution on Morningside Heights has some criticisms to offer that are at once pointed and authoritative, and well worth the attention of every one who feels that the state's money devoted to educational purposes should obtain for us something better in our national development than campus activities whose exercises of executive skill might just as well be derived from other sources, and athletic preeminence which can be obtained by the requisite industry in the gymnasium of an athletic club. Of the changes that have taken place in educational ideals during the past generation, the president of Columbia remarks:

"Young men were no longer thought to be ignorant if they left college without any serious and sustained discipline, and without any genuine grasp upon the underlying facts and the controlling history of civilization, provided they had put their names down for a sufficient number of so-called courses of study, however unrelated, however superficial, and however insignificant. The result has been that side by side with an earnest, devoted, and high-minded body of young college graduates there has gone out into American life a very substantial group of those who have gained college degrees, but who are, to all intents and purposes, as undisciplined and uneducated both in mind and in morals as if they had enjoyed no advantages whatsoever. To be sure, the members of this group are relatively small in number, but they often gain an influence and a notoriety out of all proportion to their size."

One of the growing vices in education is over-organization. Federal aid of state activities has laid its paternal hand upon the educational systems of the states. The inevitable next step is to bureaucratize and bring into uniformity the educational system of the country. Any such motive is denied, but it is evident, and grows, moreover, from the disposition of bureaucracy to extend itself. The ultimate control of education by central authority would tend to destroy the effect of vitalizing local influences and of intimate contact with the people themselves, under which it has flourished in the past. In fact, we can not touch the subject without observing how closely it is connected with the growth of paternalistic, socialistic, bureaucratic ideas and ideals. In the opinion of Dean Inge, bureaucratic socialism will probably work, but its effect is paralysis. In the opinion of President Butler, "Bureaucrats and experts will speedily take the life out of even the best schools and reduce them to dried and mounted specimens of pedagogic fatuity. Unless the school is both the work and the pride of the community which it serves, it is nothing."

Now these are not mere clever trifles, thrown off by a dilettante for his amusement and the admiration of his friends. Dissatisfaction with education is growing, not subsiding, and to the serious concern of educators. Moreover, the trouble is not confined to the United States. Twenty years ago the French embarked on the then new policy of early specialization with a view to fitting individuals for special careers, instead of sailing safely along the well-marked course of the general training of youth. Today they are trying to sail back again, if they can find the channel. They see clearly now that the true mission of secondary education is to develop the trained mind that is capable of adaptation to the varied requirements of life.

Nor is it the educator alone who perceives the dangerous divagation. So demoralizing has it been to the human material presenting itself annually for organization in the social machinery that the Lyons Chamber of Commerce has deplored the effects of the present programme of secondary instruction; and these practical men of industry and finance especially criticize the abandonment of Latin and Greek. Representatives of the English Labor Party have stated that they were seriously concerned about the restriction of education in industrial districts to barely utilitarian subjects.

Any employer or organizer knows how difficult it is today to get hold of adaptable persons, thoroughly trained persons, above all reliably trained persons, of character and steadiness. Industrial plants need them, commercial houses need them, society needs them, life needs them; they are not forthcoming in numbers adequate to our needs. President Butler cites a recent statement of the Journal of the Society of Arts, to the effect that candidates in increasing numbers were presenting themselves for certificates in French and German and Spanish and shorthand, without the ability to write, either in the literary or calligraphic sense. Now we were promised that all the election and selection by students, and all the specialization for "life work," would produce just the opposite result from this sort of ineffectiveness and inadequacy. And sports and campus activities would supply just the right sort of training for practical values. They would develop efficiency, executive ability, and a broader and more thorough understanding of the requirements of society. Have they done it?

Apparently the most important issue that has agitated the University of California in twenty years is not whether the "humanities" shall be elective or prescribed, nor what the proper subjects of education shall be, but where the new football arena shall be situated. For the present, that row transcends in importance every consideration of scholarship, even to causing the resignation of a member of the faculty of philosophy. How George H. Howison would have scorned the whole clap-trap controversy! Yet it grows naturally out of the exaggerated emphasis that has been laid for the past thirty-five years on athletic combat as a way of popularizing universities.

Education, says President Butler, can not dispense with scholarship. And it may be added that the ideals of scholarship are infinitely above the material and transient requirements of definite trades and arts. To understand the fundamental conditions of civilization and to know the inspirations derivable from the mighty past of the race, is more than to be given the equipment for meeting the day's material necessities. Felix Adler was once asked to address a young men's club meeting at Cooper Union. He said, in effect, "If they are concerned only with the amelioration of their physical condition, I am not interested. But if they seek light upon the things of the mind and spirit I shall be glad of the opportunity to contribute what light I can."

In education we can not profitably ignore the literature of the Romans and the Greeks. It is the key to what is civilized. The administrative genius of Rome, and the intellectual brilliance of that strange race at the tip of the Balkan peninsula, along the coast of Asia Minor, and scattered over the isles of the Aegean Sea, those whom Kinglake so grandly called "imagining men," these are the endowment of mankind for its endless battle with nature and the night. They can not well be neglected for "bowls," for "tracks," for campus activities, for snap courses, for special instruction in matters that endure for a season instead of for time.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has found through statistics that there are seventy-one colleges and universities in this country now that offer special training for foreign service. A total enrollment for the ten institutions, each having more than 100 students taking foreign trade subjects, gives a registration of 2255 students. The University of Washington, Seattle, heads the list with 407 students and New York University is second with 401 students.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

King Victor Emmanuel has conferred the decoration of Knight Commander of the Crown of Italy on William R. Mead of New York, president of the American Academy in Rome. The honor was bestowed in recognition of Mr. Mead's pioneer work in introducing Roman and Italian renaissance architectural styles in America. Mr. Mead is a member of the firm of McKim, Mead & White, architects, of New York. His firm drew the plans for the most notable structures in New York, including Madison Square Garden, the new postoffice, and the municipal office building.

Mrs. Larz Anderson, wife of the former Ambassador to Brussels and Tokyo, has manifested still another phase of versatility by publishing a novel. Mrs. Anderson, who is the daughter of Commodore George Perkins, has received the French Croix de Guerre, the Belgian Medal of Elizabeth with Red Cross, and the Red Cross of the Order of Merit of Japan. Isabel Perkins was born in Boston in 1876. She was educated at a private school in Boston; and married, 1897, Larz Anderson of Washington, D. C. Mrs. Anderson is the author of a number of books for children and of several books of travel. She is the first woman to receive the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters from George Washington University (1918).

Albert Henry Washburn of Middleborough, Massachusetts, has been nominated by President Harding as our diplomatic representative at Vienna. Mr. Washburn served as consul at Magdeburg, Germany, 1890-3, and at one time was private secretary to Senator Henry Cabot Lodge. Mr. Washburn is a lawyer with offices in New York. He was special United States Treasury counsel in customs cases, 1901-04, when he resigned to enter private practice. He is a permanent member of the United States Legal Advisory Board of Massachusetts. Since 1917 he has been president of the Association of the Customs Bar; and since 1919 he has been professor of political science and international law at Dartmouth College. He is senior member of the firm of Comstock & Washburn.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of the Outlook and author of many religious books, recently passed his eighty-sixth birthday. Dr. Abbott was born in Roxbury, Massachusetts, December 18, 1835. He was graduated from the University of New York in 1853 and received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Harvard and Yale, respectively, in 1890 and 1903. Meanwhile he had been admitted to the New York bar, 1856—an organization of which he is still a member. In 1860 he was ordained and from '60 to '65 he was pastor of a Congregational church in Terre Haute, Indiana. From '65 to '69 he was preaching in New York. From thence to 1888 he was engaged in writing, but in the latter year he succeeded Henry Ward Beecher as pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, a post he held till '99. With Henry Ward Beecher he had been associate editor of the Christian Union. In 1893 he became editor-in-chief of the Outlook. In his long and varied life Dr. Abbott has become one of the most characteristic figures in American letters.

Mme. Marie Jeritza, the new star of the Metropolitan, received her musical education in Vienna, where under the training of Puccini she became one of the stars of the opera in that city famous at one time as an opera centre. She has sung in Russia, Budapest, and the Scandinavian countries. And as a singer of great promise had been asked to come to America at the outbreak of the war. When she did come to America last October there were few comments. A new singer had joined the forces of the Metropolitan. That was all that was heard till after the first performance of "La Tosca." Now it is said to be hard to obtain opera seats when Mme. Jeritza sings, except at fabulous prices and through speculators. Jeritza's most striking feature is her heavy blonde hair. She looks to be in her early twenties. She is a native of Brünn, formerly a city in Austria, but since the recent partitioning of states in Central Europe, part of Czechoslovakia. Four years ago the singer married Baron von Popper. Mme. Jeritza is going to Carlsbad in April, when the opera season closes. This does not mean a complete rest, as her professor will coach her during the summer. Later in the summer the singer plans to go to her little place in the Tyrolean Alps, about ten hours from Vienna. Even here, though, she plans to continue her work for the coming New York season. The programme for next year will be given her before she leaves, and this will mean a hard summer's work. It is possible that she will sing in Norway and Sweden before returning to America in the fall.

A few days before the announcement that the Order of Merit had been bestowed on Sir James Barrie, the following speculation appeared in the Manchester Guardian: "Four suggested Sir James Frazer as a man of world reputation, whose work had stood the test of time. His 'Golden Bough' was first published thirty-two years ago. Professor F. H. Bradley, the philosopher, it was agreed, was in the same class, although on the more crowded side. He, too, would honor the order. Lord Grey and Mr. Asquith were named, but as Lord Morley, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour, and Lord Haldane are members, the politicians have already four out of the eleven civil members. Mr. Rudyard Kipling was well supported, but it is believed that he had already declined the honor. Why was Mr. Sargent not of the order—surely there were artists in England since Sir L. Alma-Tadema died? The answer is that Mr. Sargent is an American and the order is open only to British subjects as ordinary members, foreign members being honorary, and it would be absurd to put Mr. Sargent among the foreign members. There is no painter in England holding quite the same prestige, although the names of Mr. Wilson Steer, whose portrait hangs in the Uffizzi at Florence, and Mr. Augustus John at once come to mind. The most distinguished living English sculptor is, of course, Mr. Alfred Gilbert, but as he is no longer a member of any English body and lives abroad he is unlikely to be chosen. In architecture the name that came to every one's mind was Sir Edward Lutyens. It was agreed that he was a certainty, but the general feeling was that his time had not yet come. The same was thought of Mr. Conrad and Mr. Gilbert Murray. The question was raised why no woman had been appointed since Florence Nightingale. Mrs. Fawcett's name was the one on which there was agreement."

Ode.

How sleep the brave who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung:
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair
To dwell, a weeping hermit, there!

—William Collins.

The Battle of Limerick.

Ye Genii of the nation,
Who look with veneration,
And Ireland's desolation on sadly deplore;
Ye sons of General Jackson,
Who thrangle on the Saxon,
Attend to the transaction upon Shannon shore.

A chief of ancient line,
'Tis William Smith O'Brine,
Reprints this darling Limerick, this ten years or more:
O the Saxons can't endure
To see him on the flure,
And thrimble at the Cicero from Shannon shore.

This valliant son of Mars
Had been to visit Par's,
That land of Revolution, that grows the tricolor;
And to welcome his return
From pilgrimages furren,
We invited him to tay on the Shannon shore.

Then we summoned to our board
Young Meagher of the Sword;
'Tis he will sheathe that battle-axe in Saxon gore:
And Mitchil of Belfast
We bade to our repast,
To dthrink a dish of coffee on the Shannon shore.

'Twould binifit your sows,
To see the butthered rowls,
The sugar-tongs and sangwidges and craim galyore,
And the muffins and the crumpets,
And the band of harps and thrumpets,
To celebrated the sworry upon Shannon shore.

When full of tay and cake,
O'Brine began to spake;
But juice a one could hear him, for a sudden roar
Of a ragamuffin rout
Began to yell and shout,
And frighten the propriety of Shannon shore.

As Smith O'Brine harangued,
They battered and they banged;
Tim Doolan's doors and windies down they tore;
They smashed the lovely windies
(Hung with muslin from the Indies),
Purshuing of their shindies upon Shannon shore.

With throwing of brickbats,
Drowned puppies and dead rats,
These ruffin democrats themselves did lower;
Tin kettles, rotten eggs,
Cabbage-stalks, and wooden legs,
They flung among the patriots of Shannon shore.

Oh the girls began to scrame
And upset the milk and crame;
And the honorable gintlemen, they cursed and swore:
And Mitchil of Belfast,
'Twas he that looked agast,
When they roasted him in effigy by Shannon shore.

Oh the lovely tay was spilt
On that day of Ireland's guilt;
Says Jack Mitchil, "I am kilt! Boys, where's the back door?"
'Tis a national disgrace;
Let me go and veil me face";
And he bouted with quick pace from the Shannon shore.

"Cut down the bloody horde!"
Says Meagher of the Sword,
"This conduct would disgrace any blackamore";
But the best use Tommy made
Of his famous battle blade
Was to cut his own stick from the Shannon shore.

Immortal Smith O'Brine
Was raging like a line;
'Twould have done your sowl good to have heard him roar;
In his glory he arose,
And he rush'd upon his foes,
But they hit him on the nose by the Shannon shore.

Then the Futt and the Dthragoons
In squadthrons and platoons,
With their music playing chunes, down upon us bore:
And they beat the rattatoo,
But the Peellers came in view,
And ended the shaloo on the Shannon shore.

MORE BIBLIOLATRY.

A. Edward Newton, Writer and Collector, Continues to Write and Collect.

The exact relation between bibliolatriy and burglary has not yet been traced, but we believe there are bibliolaters, or bibliophiles, who collect books merely for the "faces of their backs," and who would suffer little damage if other bibliophiles, gifted with burglarious talents, were to take away their treasures and substitute deceptively painted boards. Then, undoubtedly, there are bibliophiles who read the books they collect. And here and there we have one who not only collects and reads, but who produces more of these objects of worship—like some pagan Polynesian who from "bowing down to wood and stone," reaches a stage in which he hews out gods in rows. Of such last is Dr. A. Edward Newton, collector and essayist. And it may justly be said of him that he chops out good gods.

His earlier volume, "The Amenities of Book Collecting," was imbued with the charms of a charming personality. Now he tenders "A Magnificent Farce," composed of essays, and some related chapters, drawn from a life of culture and fine friendships, and from his extraordinary collection of illustrative materials. Its spirit of humorous candor instantly forms a bond with the reader, and one feels throughout that he is being admitted to a literary intimacy with a rare character.

A. Edward Newton is a Philadelphia manufacturer, "decorated" for his service to letters with academic degrees from several universities; and he says of the formation of taste and style that brought him this distinction:

Trollope is said to have damaged his reputation by his confession as to the way in which he wrote; at the risk of utterly destroying mine, I want to say that any style I may have acquired is the result of writing advertisements of electrical apparatus for many years. When one is selling a page of writing, one receives, I suppose, as much as five, or even twenty-five dollars a page. When one is buying a page of advertising, one pays anywhere from one hundred to five thousand dollars a page! The discriminating reader will discover upon which page the most time is spent.

With A. Edward Newton, the joy of collecting flows, apparently, from the duty of collecting. This is real worship, ethical, moral, beyond mere pagan god-carving and devil-dodging. He serves his cult with devotion. He tells us:

When I think how much pleasure I get from reading, I feel it my duty to buy as many current books as I can. I "collect" Meredith and Stevenson, the purchase of whose books no longer benefits them. Why should I not also collect George Moore or Locke or Conrad or Hergesheimer? which, by the way, I do. And while you may not be able to get such an inscription in your copy of the first edition of Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln" as I have in mine, you should get a copy of the book before it is too late. All these men are engaged in carrying on the glorious tradition of English literature. It is my duty to give them what encouragement I can; to pay tribute to them. I wish I were not singular in this.

But there is more in him than mere reverence for letters in general and blind adulation of greatness. He is constructively critical. With masterly vigor he bashes in the heads of some undeserving traditions. We judge that the attitude of Ruskin in regard to fine bindings at prohibitive tariffs would to him hardly look sane, to say nothing of sensible. What he thinks of William Morris in this field he thus makes clear:

I have always resented William Morris' attitude toward books. Constantly preaching on art and beauty for the people, he set about producing books which are as expensive as they are beautiful, which only rich men can buy, and which not one man in a hundred owning them reads. Whereas my friend Mr. Mosher of Portland, Maine—I call him friend because we have tastes in common; I have, in point of fact, never met him or done more than exchange a check for a book with him—has produced, not a few, but hundreds of books which are as nearly faultless as books can be, at prices which are positively cheap.

The foibles of his own class seem quite apparent to him. There are collectors who will pay a tall price for a book whose age or priority is marked by some broken letter, when they could get a better-printed copy at almost no price at all. In a footnote on a certain work our author says:

The word "Wrote" is indicative of the first edition, which is now worth five thousand dollars. When "wrote" became "written" as it did in the later editions, the value sinks to a few shillings.

And the man seems to have no piety whatever about the demi-gods. You browse through page after page of fascinating chat and lace-like humor, and suddenly you get some such tonic cold shower as this:

From contemplation one may become wise, but knowledge comes only by study. It was the future rather than the past that interested Whitman, and he prophesied in a large and ample way, carefully avoiding details. The names of the world's great men came glibly to his tongue as needed, but I suspect that he knew little of them besides. His literary judgments and pronouncements were frequently foolish.

That is terrible. Whitman is supposed by certain mystics to have entered into "cosmic consciousness," whatever that may mean—a sublime status of unknown metes and bounds reached only by a few Buddhas. To have a book collector and author whom universities have encouraged point out to us that any judgment of Whitman on any subject in human ken could be foolish, is like having an Einstein come along and tell us that everything straight is bent.

The volume takes its title from the first essay, which is concerned with the most spectacular of state trials, that of Warren Hastings. Dr. Newton lives at Daylesford, on the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad, where there is a little shed-and-platform station, named by an old man after the English estate of his particular admiration, Hastings. A train conversation with a fellow-commuter who thought there should be a monument to the great Indian satrap at Valley Forge, because we should "keep alive the names of those old Revolutionary heroes," led to a re-reading of Macaulay on the trial, beginning thus:

After dinner, lighting a cigar, I strolled about my library, murmuring to myself, "The Hall was worthy of the trial; it had resounded with acclamations at the coronations of thirty kings,"—or some such matter. I had not read Macaulay's essay on Warren Hastings, which is one of his best, for many years; but these purple patches have a way of fixing themselves, somewhat unsteadily perhaps, even in so poor a memory as mine. The subject haunted me, but I could not remember whether the great trial had resulted in a conviction or an acquittal, or exactly what it was about. "High crimes and misdemeanors"—my memory seemed to say. It might not be a bad idea to revive a faded recollection. I had expected to be through with Warren Hastings before I had finish my cigar, but a year was to elapse before I was tired of the subject. One of the joys of being a desultory reader is that one may read as one chooses.

An immense amount has been written on Warren Hastings, but, as is usual, when Macaulay has written upon a subject, what he has said is remembered, and all else is forgotten. At this late day a phrase much employed by one of Hastings' biographers, "Be this as it may," suggests that one can take one's choice of the many contradictory statements and draw one's own conclusions.

Follows a discussion of this significant episode which our author stigmatizes as "A Magnificent Farce," and illumines with the most revealing observations. One of them with a world of meaning in it occurs in this vivid exposition of the changes of time and politics:

But many and great changes had taken place in England during Hastings' absence—changes of which Hastings, who was an administrator rather than a politician, could know nothing, and which majesty deemed unworthy of notice. The mere fact that Hastings was favorably received by the king raised up a party against him. The younger Pitt, who was in power, at once became suspicious. Hastings had probably forgotten his arch-enemy, Francis; but Francis had come to have great influence over Burke, then at the height of his reputation; and we are justified in believing that Burke was prompted, not alone by his partisan zeal, but by his love of justice, when he decided that Hastings' conduct in India should be reviewed in London.

The Indian question was then a difficult question, as the Irish question now is, and seemingly as impossible of solution. To say "India" was to start something. Instantly there was a division of public opinion. The king, the court, and Lord Chancellor Thurlow all took Hastings' side. Burke ranged on his, Pitt, Sheridan, and Fox; indeed, almost without exception the most brilliant and forceful men in the nation. The preparation for the trial was the work of several years and the brief (?), when printed with its index, filled twenty-four folio volumes.

As to the method, or lack of method, of pursuing, roping, breaking, and riding the hobby-horse of book collecting, this may comfort those inexpert in such matters:

It is a curious thing, what trifling incidents give a slant to one's collecting; all through life it is the same story. One goes to a party, passes a dish of ice-cream to a person with a pair of particularly bright eyes, becomes engaged, married, and done for almost before one knows it. My interest in Defoe came about just as fortuitously. Many years ago I was spending a week or so in Oxford, occasionally running up to London on business. One day my affairs took me into the City Road, and having an hour to spare, I spent it prowling around in Bunhill Fields Burying Ground, looking at the graves of the all-but-forgotten worthies buried there. Quite unexpectedly I came upon the grave of Bunyan, and a little later upon the monument to Defoe, erected by subscriptions of the children of England. The discovery gave me a pleasant thrill. That evening, after dinner, in a tiny smoking-room of the King's Arms in Oxford, I fell into conversation with an American gentleman who appeared interested in Defoe, and to him, in a few well-chosen words, I imparted my opinion of the author of "Robinson Crusoe." He agreed with me, set me right here and there, and was a very charming companion altogether. Subsequently I was rather disconcerted when I discovered that I had been explaining Defoe to the greatest living authority on that author—Professor William P. Trent of Columbia University. He was spending a summer in Oxford, engaged in the well-nigh insuperable task of studying Defoe pamphlets in the Bodleian Library.

There are chapters dealing with the luck of the collector, with the conduct of book shops, and of booksellers, with searches for souvenirs of Keats and Dr. Johnson and Goldsmith. There are chapters on a quarto Hamlet, and on mad Blake, and on "My Old Lady, London." Such subjects as these might be discussed by anybody, though it is difficult to believe they would be discussed with more of grace and sympathy. Dr. Newton loves his London, and we suspect him of drinking tea of afternoons. These subjects, we say, might be discussed by anybody. But where is the bibliolater who could induce London to break his leg?

For A. Edward Newton, London did just that, with the help of a four-wheeler navigated by a drunken pilot. It is a rare, probably unique, distinction. We would almost wager what you like that this is the only bibliophile who is also an essayist and has sold stuff to the Atlantic, who has had his leg broken in just that manner. The probabilities are much against it, and it may not happen again in a century; but this one time it happened. And though it was excruciating, the reader bears it with fortitude, for straightway, and almost before he knows it, the author is whisked into the charity ward of a London hospital, there to remain for weeks under circumstances denied and impossible to any ordinary writer. It is St. Bartholomew's—"Bart's" as its affectionate inmates call it, and he presents this sort of picture of its inside life:

But to return to Pitcairn Ward. It was a large room, with a high ceiling, and with two rows of beds, twelve to a row, on either side of a wide aisle. It was heated by a soft-coal-burning device, something like a range, but with a large open grate, the smoke from which curled lazily up the chimney. One morning it was discovered that the fire was out; and as this seemed to indicate neglect, and certainly meant work for the ward-maid, each patient as he woke and made this discovery sang out cheerily, "Fire's out." To these remarks the maid usually replied by asking the speaker to mind his own business; or perhaps she contented herself by making faces or sticking her tongue out at him.

Presently a curious sound was heard from the chimney, as of a fluttering of birds, followed by a curious cry, "Peep, peep, peep," which was instantly recognized by those familiar with it as being the professional call of the chimney sweep. Some one cried, "Sweeps!" The effect was instantaneous. As when one discovers a ship in mid-ocean and announces the fact, all rush to the rail, so all who could crowded in wheel-chairs around the fireplace, only to be told to "Be off" by the ward-maid.

Presently the sounds grew louder, until, at last, a tall, slender lad, black with soot from head to foot, armed with brushes and brooms, slid down into the grate, leaped out, gave a little scream, bowed, and disappeared, almost before we could clap our eyes upon him. My intention had been to ask the little urchin to get into a bed next to mine, at that moment vacant, and give an imitation of Charles Lamb's chimney-sweep "asleep like a young Howard in the state bed of Arundel Castle." I probably saved myself a lot of trouble by being so surprised at his quick entrance and get-away that I said not a single word. "A chimney-sweeper quickly makes his way through a crowd by being dirty."

Here, lingering in pain, Dr. Newton learned the Cockney language until he could speak it like a native; and he learned at the same time these things about the Cockney shave:

Anything kinder, anything more considerate than the authorities of the hospital, from Mr. Willett down to the ward-maid, could hardly be imagined. There was, however, one ordeal against which I set my face like flint—namely, shaving. Shaving was I think an extra; its cost, a penny. Every day a man and a boy entered the ward, the boy carrying a small tub filled with thick soapsuds, the man with a razor incredibly sharp. One cried, "Shaves?" and perhaps from two or half a dozen beds came the word, "Yus." No time was lost in preliminaries. A common towel was tied around one's neck, and a brush like a large round paint-brush was dipped into the thick lather. With a quick movement, the result of much practice, the boy made a pass or two from ear to ear; with a twist and a return movement, the cheeks, lips, mouth, and chin were covered with soap. The man wielded a razor in much the same manner, and the victim spent the next hour or two patting his face with his hands, then withdrawing them and looking at them, as if he expected to see them covered with blood. The operation was complete. I use the word "operation" advisedly; although chloroform was not administered, I always insisted that it should have been.

In this day of new-fangled Socialisms one wonders whether any real, living Utopians have survived. Dr. Newton found at least one, and he was important. It was at Sawyer's bookshop in Oxford Street that our author met John Burns, the great labor leader, "without whose approval not a statue, not a pillar-box or a fire plug had been located for the past twenty years, and who had, when the war broke out, resigned all his offices of honor and emolument because he could not conscientiously go along with the government." The chance encounter led not merely to an interesting visit to Burns' home, there to inspect his great collection of books and pamphlets, but to a revelation of the man himself; for he put into Newton's hands a little copy of Sir Thomas More's "Utopia," which he had bought, as a boy, for a sixpence, and said: "This book has made me what I am; for me it is the greatest book in the world; it is the first book I ever bought, it is the cornerstone of my library—the foundation on which I have built my life. Now let us have tea."

These essays throughout are the vehicle for a delicious personal humor, a humor that toys with the trifles which, as the French seer said, are important if we think them important, and which performs the inestimable service of sweetening life. There are a hundred little things on which the mind loves to dwell, and dozens of crackling epigrams such as "the sex which we have been taught to think of as fair." Yet the author has the masculine courage to be disagreeable when he thinks that is needed, and after some account of his London experiences, he returns to America, and finishes his volume thus:

We came home, and our first impressions were those of annoyance. As a nation, we have no manners; one might have supposed that we, rather than the English, had had our nervous systems exposed to the shock of battle; that we, rather than they, had been subject to air-raids and to the deprivations of war; that we had become a debtor rather than a creditor nation. We found rudeness and surliness everywhere. The man in the street had a "grouch," despite the fact that he was getting more pay for less work than any other man in the world, and that the President had told him he had an inalienable right to strike. For the first time in my life I felt that "labor would have to liquidate," to use a phrase to which, in the past, I have greatly objected. No question was civilly answered. The porter who carried our bags took a substantial tip with a sneer, and passed on. It may be that America is "the land of the free and the home of the brave"; but we found our cities dangerous, noisy, and hideously filthy. It is not pleasant to say these things, but they are true.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending March 4, 1922, were $143,000,000, an increase of $11,700,000, or nearly 9 per cent. over those of the corresponding week last year.

The scientific relation between the soldiers' bonus and business recovery is thus analyzed of the bonus vary from $1,590,000,000 to sums hugely in excess of this. The lowest figure is equivalent to more than one-third of the total amount of capital available for investment in securities in the United States in 1921. State legislation has already been enacted providing for bonuses and similar benefits amounting to more than $350,000,000, although referenda are pending with respect to part of this amount.

Plans to meet bonus requirements by taxes would perhaps be free from some of the ill effects of a large-bond issue, but in the long run it seems likely that the result would be equally bad on business. In some quarters the belief has apparently gained ground that the expenditure of bonus payments by the beneficiaries would serve to stimulate activity. If the recipients were to make the best possible use of the bonus money by adding it to their savings, it is obvious that no business stimulation would result. If, however, these funds should be immediately turned into the channels of consumption, the resulting stimulation would be temporary in character and would doubtless be followed by reaction, as the spending of the gratuities would in large part be uneconomical.

Increases in the number of carloads of freight have been so substantial and persistent since the opening of the year 1922 as to constitute a very persuasive indication that general business is reviving. When car loading began to show an increase in the second week in January, says the Railway Age, it was thought that this might be due to temporary causes. The taxes on transportation were removed on January 1st and it was believed the decline in freight shipments in December was partly due to the fact that some shippers were holding back commodities to avoid payment of the tax and would forward them in January. However, if the increase in shipments had been due to the release of goods held back to avoid the tax it would hardly have continued at an accelerated rate clear into February. It by the National Bank of Commerce of New York: The main requisite of business recovery is the lightening of governmental requirements for funds for unproductive purposes. eventually be the young men who served in the world war. These men are now the most productive part of the population of the country. They are just entering upon that period of life when responsibility for the nation's business is being gradually transferred to their shoulders. The best that could happen would be for each man, by his own efforts, to pay his own bonus. In practice, however, the result will be quite otherwise, the capable and thrifty being obliged ultimately to provide, not only for the payment of whatever bonus they may receive, but also for the payment of bonuses to their less capable and less industrious fellows. might also be that the increase in shipments was due to a larger movement of coal in anticipation of a coal mine strike on April 1st, but while there has been an increase in shipments of coal it has been smaller relatively than the increases in shipments of other kinds. After experience with the fluctuations in railroad and other lines of business during the last year and a half, most people were somewhat slow to acclaim any apparent improvement as permanent or as the harbinger of still further improvements. Certainly, however, if the recent increases in carloadings indicate anything at all, they indicate a distinct tendency toward improvement in general business.

Were there no other reason why every self-respecting and intelligent citizen should cast his vote against this suicidal proposal to take the control of California's sources of water and power out of the reach of the people of California, says Strassburger & Co.'s Review, on the proposed California Water and Power Act, it should be enough to emphasize the inevitable tendency of all such measures to fetter the development of individuality. For individualism, not socialism, has been the motive power of every step towards civilization that the human race has made. The story of progress is the staging of individual expression. We read it in the history of all the great empires, its opposite, with the consequences, in their fall. We read it in our own brief experience. The spirit of individualism brought us here, won us our independence, is responsible for our present position as the dominating power of the world.

It is the teaching of experience that when men find themselves in the possession of uncontrolled power, their personal and also their class interests undergo a process of enlargement on their mutual screen. The value placed by other people on their decisions becomes their own measure of that value. In addition, the position which they occupy weakens the habit of looking ahead to the consequences of their actions, with a keenness equal to that which would be noticed did the consequences affect them alone or principally.

We know from recent experiences how this may be. North Dakota's disastrous experiments, Russia's parlous condition, are under our eyes. No thoughtful or well-informed man charges the blame for these tragedies to the ineptitude or corrupt motives of those responsible for their enactment. To do so, indeed, would be to admit that in better hands the ventures might have proved successful. Failure is stamped on all such gambles from the start. Their success requires conditions that are not yet in sight.

The ideal to be kept in view, when defining the respective spheres of activity of the state and the individual, is the widest possible distribution of the powers of the community, combined with centralized information. Let individuals and voluntary associations make the varied experiments. The state can usefully collect and circulate the experiences resulting from these. Its business is to enable each experimenter to benefit by the experiments of others, not to make experiments itself, to the exclusion or discouragement of others. The comprehensive character of its information lends weight to the state as a disseminator of advice, and justifies it in a certain measure of control. It can lay down general rules for the conduct of those engaged in the supply of public conveniences and necessities. Its limit of usefulness extends no further. The less it attempts to do personally the more beneficial will be its power of control. Just in proportion as it attempts to conduct such enterprises itself, it will, through inevitable failure, bring itself into contempt and, by over-reaching, lose its authority. And contempt of constituted authority culminates invariably in its overthrow, with the customary violent accompaniments and general anarchy.

The William R. Staats Company is offering $1,500,000 Albers Brothers Milling Company 7½ per cent. twenty-year first closed mortgage sinking fund gold bonds in denominations of $1000, $500, and $100, dated January 1, 1922, and due January 1, 1942. Price, $100 and accrued interest, yielding 7½ per cent.

These bonds are secured by a first closed mortgage on all the company's fixed assets, consisting of real estate, chiefly well located valuable water-front properties, modern mills, and machinery, buildings, and equipment. Appraisals as given on the foregoing properties by the General Appraisal Company and independent real estate appraisers total $3,492,-

The Albers Brothers Milling Company are the largest cereal millers on the Pacific Coast. The business was established in 1893 and has been in continuous and successful operation for twenty-nine years. The company's products include approximately twenty-five brands of cereals, flour, stock and poultry food, the best known of which are "Albers Oats," "Albers Flapjack Flour," "Carnation Mush," "Albers Buckwheat Flour," and products sold under the "Peacock" brand. The "Look for the Miner" sign, their most valuable trade-mark, is well known on the entire Pacific Coast. The market for these products covers the entire Western coast, many of the interior states, Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Orient.

The company operates seven mills, located at Bellingham, Seattle, and Tacoma, Washington; Portland, Oregon; Oakland and Los Angeles, California, and Ogden, Utah; and maintains additional distributing stations at San Francisco, San Jose, and Fresno, California, a sales office in Honolulu, and sales agencies in New York, Kobe, Japan, and Dairen, Manchuria.

Logan & Bryan have removed their main office to 401 Montgomery Street, a change necessitated by expanding business. The new quarters are equipped with all facilities for the execution of orders, as well as for the convenience of patrons. The new bulletin boards are larger, and the offices, being on a corner, are well lighted. Logan & Bryan have maintained offices in San Francisco for many years and are said to have been the first to bring a special wire service to this city for the benefit of investors in New York stocks.

organized and directed, these marketing associations, assisted by the more flexible credits which it is admitted the farmer must have, will be effectual aids to the normal processes of trade in restoring agricultural conditions to their proper level, but from the continued activities of the agricultural bloc in seeking special class legislation, we may expect, if they are successful, the opening of a Pandora's box of troubles. Such legislation is fundamentally unsound, and no solution of economic ills will ever succeed that is not in agreement with basic economic laws.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Whatever prejudices one has against the published diary per se melt under a perusal of Colonel Repington's latest—"After the War" (Houghton Mifflin). In short, one comes to the conclusion that there are diarists and diarists—a novel conclusion whose inspiration required the appearance of a legitimate diary.

By a legitimate diary one of course means a diary whose end justifies its means. A less subtle code of ethics would damn all diaries because it is so easy for them to be bad. We prefer to be broader minded and even tolerate the many for the few. I am not sure it would not be worth while to tolerate the many for Colonel Repington's one. Judging entirely from his present volume, one surmises the author's previous one, unfortunately linked with other notorious memoirs of the day, must also have been legitimate. If on the complicated maze of the war he brought to bear the same keen intuition and brilliant explication with which he elucidates the equally complicated peace, then "The First World War" must be the most nearly important book on the war. One can not say "most important" where most were not.

To return to Colonel Repington's kaleidoscopic view of Europe in the past two years—the interesting thing about it is that it is different from the pictures we are used to getting. As the latter are mostly superficial when they are not propaganda, it is perhaps not strange that the lieutenant-colonel's reports should differ. His are not superficial, whatever else they may be. Besides there is a tremendous fascination about these cryptic close-ups that the diary officer has given us. They have all the intrinsic value of news—the book is hot from the press and closes with a report of the Washington Conference—and all the authority of first-hand history. Colonel Repington's publisher vaunts him as the only man of the era capable of adequately picturing Europe and the remnants of European civilization today. Superlatives are always dangerous, but it is safe to say that he is the only man up to date who has adequately interpreted the chaos of post-war Europe.

Apropos of diaries—and the subject is ubiquitous—Margot Asquith has explained how she came to publish hers. It was very simple. She had kept a diary all her life and was as surprised as any of her future readers were warranted to become when a publisher approached her with a handsome offer. Of course she accepted, because, as she candidly explains to interviewers, she needed the money.

Colonel Repington's affair is therefore patently in another class. His book is not published primarily as a pot-boiler. It doubtless serves that purpose because of its author's intimacy with the great and because he has a pen expressive as Margot's own. But his personal descriptions—particularly of women—are of a much more kindly order. Margot frankly admits that she dislikes women and the colonel as frankly admits that he does not. One is struck by the great number of women to whom he attributes grace and beauty. On that score alone our two leading diarists are at loggerheads. But personalities play a far less significant rôle in "After the War" than in Margot's famous autobiography. In the former they are casual decorations; in the latter life tissue. Colonel Repington's journal is kept with the conscious intention of becoming a source book of history. To quote his publisher again, he is the Pepys and Evelyn of our age conveniently compressed into a single individuality. This arrangement is advantageous. It obviates possible discrepancies that otherwise might challenge the authenticity of the whole. Clearly every age should have its biographer. It should be an official appointment—not left to haphazard genius. It is sheer luck that so suitable a chronicler as Colonel Repington should be self-appointed. Not every man with even his inside information wields as trenchant a pen.

Much has been said and written on the prevalence of lecturers, particularly of imported lecturers. The appeal of the imported lecturer is obvious. He comes from a strange country and is supposed to import a little of it with himself. The domestic lecturer will always be under a handicap to his foreign colleague for this reason. At least, he will be until the unhappy day dawns when we follow in Russia's footsteps. Many strange things have come out of Russia, but we hope that she keeps a monopoly of her present literary activities. Lecturing is said to be all the rage in Russia. Owing to the high cost of publishing, Russian authors have been forced to divert their literary efforts towards the lecture platform. Knowing the Russian objection to oratory, one's heart is wrung by the sad spectacle. But if it is hard on the authors, consider the auditors. An English wit has brought home the situation to the Anglo-Saxon imagination. He pictures for us a Russian Henry James reeling off a chapter from a soap-box of a Russian "Golden Bowl" to an agonized group of commuters waiting for the home train. The idea is painful, though a chapter from Dostoyevsky or Artzybashev would be even more so. Still, whoever the author, the case would be bad enough. And it is not cheering to reflect that the worse the author the more like he is to seize the happy uncensored precinct of a corner soap-box. One could understand mob rule and revolution if the printing presses were to strike and writers be allowed to victimize their public even more recklessly than they do in print. However, one hopes it is a far cry to such a state of affairs elsewhere than in Russia. The local lecturer is not yet in demand nor is his life desired by the victimized mob. Meanwhile we succumb to imported talent. It is said that the hard-up British author need only sign up for a lecture tour of the States to recoup his fortunes. But let him beware. If he runs the thing into the ground he may find that he has more than his fortunes to recoup. It is not in malice prepense nor in a spirit of inhospitality that we cry, "Enough is enough." R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The Serignan home of the great naturalist, Jean Henri Fabre, is to be purchased by the French government and made an adjunct of the Museum of Natural History under the Minister of Public Instruction. Mlle. Agla Fabre, the naturalist's daughter, will remain as custodian.

The Theatre Guild has met with a check at the hands of New York audiences—let us hope but a temporary and not discouraging one. In spite of an ambitious investiture, with much pictorial beauty in the form of color, lighting, and rich costuming, "He Who Gets Slapped" was not much applauded, and is said to have fallen flat. It is not alone. For nearly two years Broadway has resounded with the crash of falling plays. The efforts of the Theatre Guild are always watched by the discriminating with interest and with hope, but in this case there seems to have been a failure to detect the "inner meaning" of Leonid Andreev, the Russian dramatist. It might be inferred, in other words, that "the audience was not a success."

And now we have a "greatest living European expert on baseball." Whom do you suspect? E. V. Lucas, writer of almost exotic delicacy, associated in imagination with Charles Lamb, with art galleries, with delightful wanderings about London. Think of E. V. Lucas as a "fan"!

Are the literary affections of boys more constant than those of men? The question is raised by certain announcements of a leading Eastern publishing house. It is commonly estimated that an ordinary novel's life is from six months to a year. But it seems that boys differ from their elders in never letting go of an old favorite. At the same time that they publish a list of new boys' books, D. Appleton & Co. announce the twenty-fourth printing of the famous "Cruise of the Cachetot," by Frank T. Bullen, the twentieth printing of Barbour's "Behind the Line" and the seventh of the same popular writer's "Forward Pass," the eighth of Walter Camp's "Jack Hall at Yale," the fifth of William Heyliger's "Strike Three," and, to turn from fiction to more serious writing, the fourth of "Your Biggest Job—School or Business," in which Henry Lewis Smith, president of Washington and Lee University, gives counsel in a way which boys are glad to heed. It is evident that a good boys' book keeps its appeal almost indefinitely.

Edwin Arlington Robinson's volume of Collected Poems has been voted by the thirty-ninth annual meeting of the Authors' Club at New York the book of most enduring value to American letters published during 1921. This was the view of a large majority of the 260 members. The collection bears the imprint of the Macmillan Company.

Literary Italians are said to be quite severely critical of "Notturmo," the product of Gabrielle d'Annunzio's confinement in a dark room, when he was threatened with blindness owing to an airplane accident. During this distressing season the author wrote his impressions on long strips of paper: a heterogeneous mass of memories and sensations covering days of war and days of peace. It is his first literary production since the great conflict in which he played such a rocket-like part, but some of his countrymen feel that owing to a certain infusion of personal vanity and perhaps some lowering of standard compared with his earlier work, it is not happy.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

An Ordeal of Honor.

That a book may have a weak beginning, drag through a few chapters half-heartedly, and then spring into lively being is the moral of "An Ordeal of Honor." It is amazing that a novel with every earmark of conventional piffle—chance motor encounter, handsome son of a baron, family skeleton, and aristocratic albeit impoverished heroine—should boast a plot interest such as few novels have. Yet that is the case this time. So mechanically does "An Ordeal of Honor" start on its excursion into the realm of romance that the reader, if he has the naïveté to follow the plot through half its course, fully expects it to end as monotonously as it began. It does not. The fact points at least two morals—that it is not safe to review a book from reading the first two-thirds, though most reviewers would assure you that it is, and that a writer of a rattling good yarn would do far better to hang out a few signals to that effect before even the most hardy of his followers will have dropped by the wayside.

As a matter of fact "An Ordeal of Honor" gives evidence of having been written at various times, under differing inspirations, and, one would not be surprised to hear, by different authors. It is not a homogeneous whole. It begins life as a conventional society romance of the happy encounter school of fiction so largely fostered by Harold MacGrath. It evolves into a cynical picture of English upper-class manners in a way that is reminiscent of Michael Sadleir's recent book. After that it becomes a detective story, and up to date the vote is that detective stories are Mr. Pryde's forte. But the last fifth—it is literally that—becomes high-class fiction. It is better written, for one thing, but the principal distinction from the foregoing samples of versatility is that the portion of "An Ordeal of Honor" following Auburn's attempt to escape from prison, or rather, following his capture, lives and is vital. The long-suffering victim of Mr. Pryde's various styles expects Auburn to get away. He doesn't, and from that point on the yarn smacks of probability. One is encouraged to finish, and stranger still, the best is reserved for the last. The dénouement of "An Ordeal of Honor" is one of the most dramatic in recent fiction. And what is better still, it is plausible.

Fiona Macleod.

The ardent though perhaps few admirers of the Celtic fantasies of Fiona Macleod have doubtless rejoiced to see some of the lesser-known stories published in a recent handsome edition by Duffield & Co. Fiona Macleod, whose real name was William Sharp, was one of the most remarkable characters in English literature. The prose poems which he published under his odd pseudonym are among the most exquisite of their kind; the verse and prose—the latter mostly biographical—which he published throughout his normal literary career was of fair but mediocre quality.

The secret of Sharp's authorship of the Fiona Macleod books was, curiously enough, kept till his death in 1905. As late as May, 1899, Fiona Macleod wrote the Athenaeum stating that she wrote only under her own name. Sharp would enjoy a unique position in letters if for no other reason than that he had chosen to write under a woman's name. Or perhaps Fiona is not a feminine name in Gaelic. The Celtic tongues have some queer divisions of grammatical and orthographic gender from the Anglo-Saxon viewpoint. But it was evidently accepted as a woman's name by the British public, and Sharp seems to have fallen in with the joke. It would not be the first time that a man prided himself on doing one thing well—anthologies and memoirs in his case—and meanwhile and unawares did something else very much better. Or was it a curious case of dual identity that flourished and faded before the heyday of the psychiatrist?

Sharp was born in 1857 at Paisley and spent his youth in the western highlands of Scotland, doubtless amassing the legendary lore that he was later to transmute to some of the most perfect prose in our language. He attended Glasgow University, and shortly after graduation went to Australia for his health. After a cruise in the Pacific he settled in London as a bank clerk, but soon launched into journalism. He began by contributing to the Pall Mall Gazette, and later, in 1885, he became art critic of the Glasgow Herald. Also in '85 he married his cousin, Elizabeth Amelia Sharp, who collaborated with him in compiling the "Lyrica Celtica." Anthologies of verse were Sharp's great hobby. He also compiled "Sonnets of the Century" and "American Sonnets," and he was the general editor of the excellent "Canterbury Poets" series. He wrote a great deal of original verse, but his prose biographies are better known—particularly that of Rossetti, whom he knew intimately, and Shelley. Sharp even tried his dextrous hand at novel writing, and "Silence Farm" remains as a testimonial that that form also fell below his perfect mastery of Celtic myths. As Fiona Macleod, Sharp became the most conspicuous Scottish writer of the modern Gaelic renaissance. The delicious illustrations—colored prints on nice dark green mats and little line drawings for heads and tails—are not the least attraction of the new publication. But the tales themselves lift one out of the murky monotony of reality and convey their readers to the enchanted land of Celtic faery. "The Hills of Ruel and Other Stories," which has just precipitated this odd chapter of literary history, should renew interest in the beautiful work of Fiona Macleod, forerunner of the Celtic renaissance.

A Penny Whistle.

"A Penny Whistle" is one of the several volumes of B. L. T.'s that were in preparation at the time of his death. This little volume comprises some of the best of Mr. Taylor's always excellent light satiric verse. They were B. L. T.'s own choice of his production for the last eight years of his life and represented well his versatility and charm. They range from the familiar daintiness of the "Babette Ballads" to such a delightful profanity as the following eulogy of Shaw:

Let critics chew your plays, and find
Fit matter for their trade of whacking;
Let pundits analyze your mind,
And say that this or that is lacking.

For critic sass or pundit gas
I do not care a week-old cruller:
I only know that when you pass
This world will be a damsite duller.

But B. L. T.'s appreciation of current literature was not limited to contemporary humor. No one would accuse Yeats of humor, and yet B. L. T. addresses him thus:

Singer of "Innisfree" and "Wandering Aengus,"
Put on your clothes and smite the "blooming lyre"
You smote erewhile. Sing us the songs you sang us—
Of "Cathleen" and "The Land of Heart's Desire."

Walk with us through long dappled grass at golden noon,
And pluck at eve "the silver apples of the moon."

Too long in alien fields you've been a rover;
Back to the fairies, fogs, and Druid stuff!
Be like the thrush, who "sings each song twice over,"

Knowing that we shall never have enough.
Else we may fancy that you never can recapture
(As Mr. Browning wrote) that "first fine careless rapture."

Altogether a very charming volume—"A Penny Whistle"—and one to make its reader await eagerly the subsequent volumes of B. L. T.'s uniform works.

Publishers of the most important Russian newspapers have formed a cooperative association or trust, according to information received in Stockholm. The combine is to control the administration and distribution of the different papers and owners of the papers become stockholders in the trust. The Communist party is now contemplating a plan to give the daily newspapers economic freedom while the government will retain political control. Any deficit in the yearly budget of these semi-official newspapers will be covered by the Soviet government, and the central executive committee of the government will be requested to set aside a permanent fund for the support of the press.

"DECLASSEE."

The name of Zoë Akins, author of "Déclassée," has been resounding in the New York press and on New York tongues for over a year. She is a writer of marked individuality, judging from the numerous comments, favorable or adverse, on "Daddy's Gone A-Hunting," which has been having a long run at the Plymouth. "Déclassée" is a more theatrical play than "Daddy's Gone A-Hunting," and in it we do not see the author at her best. It presents the theme, already so frequently used in English drama, of the British aristocrat de-throned by her own imprudence from her high place in the most exclusive and patrician caste in the world. As we read the programme with high anticipation we think of "Lady Windermere's Fan," Tolstoy's "Anna Karenina," Galsworthy's "The Fugitive," Pinero's "Iris" and "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." It needs not membership in that exclusive caste to realize the homesick longing of those women who are exiled from its honors and privileges. And so, knowing from the title what is coming, we would fain hold back Lady Helen Haden, the daughter of a hundred earls, when we foresee that a proud, fearless, reckless, hot-headed, and uncalculating patrician is going to throw away her high estate. And yet, unlike the other women in the plays mentioned, she is unstained. It seemed to me that the first act, in which the foundation was laid for the social tragedy, is the best. The second act, which shows three or four groups sitting at tea in the lounge of a New York hotel, is rather aggravating. People come and go, and the different groups in turn pop up in a lot of dialogue, the others subsiding into mute pantomime. The effect is not natural, and it is taxing to the hearing and the understanding. We have to place the new characters, and recognize those already met in their unfamiliar street wear. I freely confess that I was rather slow in placing the ambassadorial group; also in catching the conversation on the fly, for there is an epidemic of indistinctness, or inaudibility, in the "Déclassée" company which made the ellipses in Zoë Akins' rather peculiar style even more elliptical. There was one actress at the back left table, a minor member of the company, who was determined to be heard though the heavens fell. May heaven's choicest blessings light upon her head!

This second act shows Lady Helen in her equivocal position. She has lost social prestige, financial credit; she is cut by American climbers, and she is wooed by a man with a left-handed offer. Still, she is so loved by her old and real friends that when the ambassadorial group see her they metaphorically take her to their hearts.

At any rate, in the third act the left-handed wooer becomes right-handed, and things look safe for Lady Helen. Unfortunately the suitor is romantic. His spirit of romanticism has made him recognize that Lady Helen has loved and suffered, and in a mood of generosity and self-sacrifice he is prepared to efface himself in favor of a returned and regenerated lover.

This precipitates catastrophe, for Lady Helen only sees a slight in the withdrawal of her suitor, who has wished to surprise her with the unexpected sight of her old lover.

Zoë Akins has a talent for contriving surprises, but she works tortuously to accomplish them. In the first act we were surprised at Thayer's rascality, in the last at the woman's constancy, the man's regeneration, but we do not sympathize with it. Once a cur—of that kind, anyway—always a cur. Apparently the author does not sympathize either, since she invokes a catastrophe to allow Lady Helen a way out.

The company that has been selected to support Ethel Barrymore is of sufficient merit, but not of striking quality. We are not likely to go off the handle over any of them. The leading man, Henry Daniell, is a young Englishman easy in a drawing-room, but who has not quite sufficient charm and magnetism to account for Thayer's empire over the constant heart of a glorious woman—for that is what the author means her to be—such as Lady Helen. Edward Emery gave an agreeable pre-entation of the rich American Jew who was so gentle and considerate to his cast-off mistress when real love came for another woman. Jane West was very handsome and smart and hard as the beautiful and uncompassionate Mrs. Leslie, Virginia Chauvenet and Irby Marshall were satisfactory as English aristocrats, and Gabrielle Ravine's appearance suited the rôle of the fortune-teller. Mary De Wolf expressed the gentleness and constancy of the rejected mistress, but she stands and walks like an inexperienced player. Messrs. Lord as Sir Bruce, Delevanti as Harry, Hubbard as Del Magiore, and Wellesley as Sir Emmett Wildering complete the cast except for the star, all being competent to fill their rôles to our satisfaction.

Ethel Barrymore has not been here for ten years. We last saw her, as I remember, at the Orpheum in "The Ten-Pound Look." We have been hearing so much about her weight that it surely is not maladroitness to mention that it is still there, in spite of a mendacious press agent's fairy tale. But so is Ethel Barrymore, the handsome, magnetic, eye-engrossing woman; changed, of course, and with her mannerisms more pronounced, but still womanly, fascinating, almost—but not quite—irresistible.

But, away from her fond and faithful New York constituency, we, who survey Miss Barrymore with calmer vision, find that, born actress though she is, inevitably destined like all her family for the stage, dowered with a rich and magnetic personality, lovely once and still handsome in her markedly individualistic style, she has allowed an incrustation of faults to form over her marked talent. I am much inclined to think that, somewhat spoiled by the atmosphere of adulation in which she has passed her stage life, Miss Barrymore has underestimated the discrimination of her public, and allowed herself to lapse from her artistic standards. Else how account for the slipshodness of her speech? That is an old fault, but she has allowed it to grow on her. In her long speeches she falls into a sort of exaggerated vocal slide, tumbles several words together, and I know no player of reputation who can so lightly and airily vault over a full stop, and leave it crushed and disregarded. Furthermore, in pursuit of the naturalistic method she allows her delightful contralto voice to lapse into inaudible murmurs. Naturalness is no consolation whatever to an audience that does not know what the naturalistic player is talking about.

Besides these faults of acting Miss Barrymore, in the first act particularly, was not as well groomed as a popular actress, fresh from the purlieus of New York, seat of American style, should be. Some one complained bitterly that she wore r-b-b-r c-r-s-ts, and I shouldn't wonder if it is true. Besides, her slippers were decidedly shabby. But she did look stunning in the ivory white satin.

Against these omissions, artistic and sartorial, we must place the dramatic instinct of the woman which made her depict Lady Helen as so dauntless in the face of life's ignoble terrors. That smile in the face of the world meant, "I am the captain of my soul." In the final scene, however, her position was unsuitable, and Lady Helen's final exit too prolonged. But, generally speaking, the actress fills Zoë Akins' concept of a woman of surpassing charm and splendid, naturally noble womanhood whose social preëminence in the first act makes her wistful, homesick longing for the England that is lost to her all the more touching in the later scenes. There are spots on the sun, true; it is less dazzling than of yore; but still its effulgence warms our hearts.

THE W. L. GEORGE LECTURE.

What's the matter with San Francisco, generally so ready to look up New York sensations that come our way? W. L. George was a New York success. He has been widely quoted in the New York press for his comments on our country and our womenkind, and these excerpts from his lectures went far afield in the American press.

Add to this that W. L. George is one of the most prominent members of the modern school of British fiction and that he is a noted feminist, and you have an additional and very cogent reason for thinking he would attract large numbers of women.

But at his first lecture, entitled "The Intelligence of Women," there was a greater representation of men. Perhaps the mean things went to learn if there is a such a thing, and perhaps the women suspected that cold water was going to be thrown on their pretensions. At any rate they held back, but I wager they will turn out strong to hear the authority on problems concerned with sex offer his views as to how men and women get along in a—presumably—life partnership.

In his first lectures it was apparent at once that the English author had popularized his discourse by making it anecdotal and witty. "Woman," says Mr. George, with a specious air of conviction, "is not inferior; only different." And then he proceeds to give a number of instances that show that woman has no logic. They are prone to vain repetition, when trying to prove a point, and to interpose illogical assertions as impediments in the path of logic.

The miserable wretch accuses us of superstition, of getting sick of discussions before they have reached their logical conclusion, and—crowning affront—of woman not being the mystery that she has always popularly been supposed to be; man himself having invented the fable of the mystery of woman. However, he gets in a few whacks at the men, when he recalls Shakespeare's, Dante's, and Goethe's attitude of superiority toward women, and that man more than woman is terrified by public opinion; in other words, that Mrs. Grundy is Mr. Grundy.

One of the most discerning of Mr. George's remarks, after he had poked a little fun at woman for enjoying, with an air of superiority, her alleged inscrutability, was that in which he advanced the idea that there was no mystery of woman, but a mystery of mankind; men puzzling women, and women puzzling men.

As to the sentimental idea concerning womanhood, the greater purity and saintliness of woman, her tenderness, the soft hand on the brow of care, etc., the lecturer absolutely refrained from applying a single poultice to feminine vanity.

As his books show, Mr. George is a modern of the moderns. The moderns have parted with much of the reticence that used to characterize Anglo-Saxon fiction. Nowadays they are much given to adventures in sexuality. Of course women read them with absorbing interest, for that is the only opportunity many women have in our faulty code of civilization approximately to penetrate the secrets of life.

The deficiency in these modernists who are so given to brilliantly written analyses of secret amours is that, like the Latin novelists, they are so obsessed by their subject that they fail to open to our view those larger and finer vistas of the human life and soul—or call it heart, if you prefer—which put courage and hope into us and give some refreshing exercise to our finer sensibilities.

Truth-telling is the aim of the modernist; and perhaps these young men who live the lives that they so truthfully depict offer a few clues to the older generation with which to penetrate the enigmatic soul of twentieth-century youth.

Let us therefore have the truth. But there are truths and truths. There is little doubt that the war has had a deterrent effect upon the flowering of human virtues. Young men and women lost their ideals, and some day the logical result will be that the newer generations will have truer ones. But in the meantime, while we recognize that modern fiction is a phase in human evolution which we must accept, we still hope that it will not continue to bear such a strong family resemblance to Continental fiction.

There are, it is true, great differences; there is, for instance, much keener analysis in the Anglo-Saxon fiction, the French being content sardonically to lay the adventures of their puppets before us without much comment.

AT THE PLAYERS.

March at the Players has come in like a lamb, as "Plots and Playwrights" (by Edward Massey) requires a cast of seventeen for its presentation, and a group of the junior members of the club—young lambkins in the limelight—are brought to the fore. This is as it should be, for, though the Players Theatre has, in a measure, entered into the commercial game, yet after all it is a society of amateurs who have joined for the purpose of occasionally appearing before the public and bidding for its favor.

Being in the commercial game would seem to necessitate putting forward the more sophisticated players of the organization rather oftener than the small fry. But the small fry have their rights, and they have been duly heeded in the selection of the cast for "Plots and Playwrights."

It should be added, however, that the small fry do not have it all their own way, since Mrs. Jane Parent, the senior member of the Players, and Mr. Frank Darien, temporary director during the vacation of Mr. Reginald Travers, fill two of the important rôles with the ease and assurance of veterans.

Miriam Elkus, also, who is a favorite with the Players' clientèle, contributes a very natural brogue to the rôle of a lodging-house Goodheart, who takes a friendly interest in the affairs of the most respectable lodgers.

"Plots and Playwrights" is a novelty. It presents a separate little drama for each floor of the lodging-house, and has a grand wind-up when everything goes off like gay fireworks into burlesque melodrama.

The little separate dramas are fairly interesting, and the wind-up act sufficiently absurd. But the general effect lacks dramatic unity, and one feels that the playwright has not put his besticks into a work of this kind. It is lively fantasia, but only talent and experience could make it show itself off.

However, it is, as I said, a good selection in order to give the kindergartners a chance. Not that they are all kindergartners; Peggy Tomson, Percy McGuire, Léon Bowen, Ernest Clewe, and one or two others having made good in previous rôles. But as a general thing the cast made an impression of extreme youth and tender inexperience.

But it is a red-letter experience in their ranks. The bright young gum-chewing girl—I can't locate her on the long programme—made a hit. Happy gum-chewer! But, little gum-chewer, you must get some of that scratchiness out of your voice, even if you are trying to be tough. Young Peggy Shearer has a silvery little voice of her own, but she needs to borrow some of the gum-chewer's—Edith West, her name is—greater ease in gesture and attitude.

As for the rest, it was just a swirl of young men who were not sufficiently remarkable to be disentangled. But they all plunged into their rôles with youthful abandon, and an equally youthful audience reflected their ardor of dramatic enjoyment.

A novelty in the restaurant scene was the set used; a black and white silhouette representing cups, steins, tea-pots, and so forth, standing in cut-out white distinctness against a black background.

Bulgaria's Unique Stamp.

Copies of the new set of postage stamps issued by Bulgaria late in December have just arrived in this country (according to the New York Times). They are arousing peculiar interest among collectors because they are the first stamps upon which the portrait of a journalist has ever appeared. The stamps are a commemorative set, issued in memory of the services to Bulgaria of James David Bourchier, who for more than thirty years was the Balkan correspondent of the London Times. He died on December 30, 1920, and the stamps were placed in circulation on that date last year, the first anniversary of his death.

Mr. Bourchier spent more than half of his life in the Balkans and the neighboring countries in the southeastern part of Europe. Besides his extensive newspaper and periodical writings he wrote several books and he was decorated with various orders by the rulers of Bulgaria, Greece, and Montenegro. He died in Bulgaria and is buried in the church of the Rilo Monastery, on one of the loftiest mountain ranges near the southwestern border of the country.

This is the first time in the history of philately that a country has issued a complete set of stamps commemorative of the deeds of a foreigner. It is seldom that a country honors in its postal design the memory of a prominent person of a foreign land. A portrait of Washington has appeared on a stamp of Brazil, several South American countries honor Bolívar on their stamps, and Chile, several years ago, on one stamp, portrayed Admiral Lord Cochrane, who commanded the Chilean navy in its war of independence about a century ago. These are exceptional cases, and the honor paid by Bulgaria to the British writer, Bourchier, is exceptional.

Special facilities to care for the spiritual welfare of church members addicted to playing golf Sunday morning will be installed by the Dixmoor Golf Club of Chicago. A wireless receiving station will be set up as soon as the links are opened in the spring, so that members can listen to their favorite pastor while enjoying a cigarette on the veranda.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Maitland Playhouse.

"The Duke of Killcrankie," written by Captain Robert Marshall and played so successfully by John Drew, opens Monday night at the Maitland, and a clever, amusing comedy is to be offered the play-going public.

Drew, when he started in this comedy, was supported by Fannie Brough, a famous English actress, and Margaret Dale. Drew had also played "The Royal Family" and "Second in Command," both by Marshall, but he made the biggest hit with his characterization of the Duke, who was in love with several women. Arthur Maitland will, of course, appear in the title-role.

That the public is not surfeited with Shaw plays has been evident from the enthusiasm and good crowds that have been greeting "Man and Superman," that story of the pursuit of man by woman being done this week at the Maitland. It is easily one of the most popular of the Shaw plays, and the performance is all that could be desired.

"The Climax," by Locke, will follow "The Duke of Killcrankie."

The Orpheum.

Hal Skelley is from musical comedy. He is credited with being the best extemporaneous comedian on the stage, and it is claimed that he can dance any dance conceivable. His present vehicle is a comedy skit with music called "The Mutual Man." The story is a new handling of mistaken identity.

In size Ruby Norton tips the scales around the 100th mark. In ability she is a heavyweight, and so she has been dubbed "the little big star of song." Miss Norton returns next week, with Clarence Senna, a piano soloist, who also plays accompanist.

To do one thing, and do it well, is quite an accomplishment for most of us, while the ability to accomplish two things simultaneously made a name for one Julius Caesar that has endured for two thousand years. Harry Kahne, who will be seen at the Orpheum next week, seems destined for a spot in the Hall of Fame, as he succeeds in baffling audiences everywhere by accomplishing six different things at one time. The six mental achievements of Mr. Kahne include reading and transcribing to a blackboard newspaper headings, written upside down and backwards, listening to and answering questions pertaining to the capitals of the states, giving their population, and telling what the cities are noted for, adding a column of figures upside down and backwards, and dividing a number up in the billions given him by the audience into six unequal parts, which, when added together, make the original sum.

Miller and Mack are called "the Bing Boys." They are a snappy pair of eccentric and dancing funsters. They get a laugh as well as a lift out of a song.

"A Little of This and That" as provided by Keegan and O'Rourke makes a lot of entertainment. They offer a specialty of songs and talk.

Kinzo, the Japanese juggler, has but just come from the Orient. All of Kinzo's feats are different.

Pat Rooney and Marion Bent and their enjoyable "Rings of Smoke" remain a second week, and so does Ann Gray, the harpist.

The Grand Opera Season.

The Chicago Grand Opera Company will open its second season in San Francisco on Monday evening, March 27th, in the Civic Auditorium, under the management of Selby C. Oppenheimer. The Auditorium will be transformed into the semblance of an opera house, and additional care is being given to the comfort of the patrons. A horseshoe of boxes is being constructed and every seat on the lower floor is being set at an elevation and an angle that will allow a perfect view of the stage.

"Aida" will open the fortnight's engagement on March 27th. Rosa Raisa sings the title-role, with Edward Johnson as Rhadames. Cyrena Van Gordon will be heard as Amneris, and Giacomo Rimini will lend distinction to the rôle of the Ethiopian king, Amonasro. The great chorus, the Pavley-Oukrainsky ballet, and the stage band of forty will make this an impressive performance.

The director-general, Mary Garden, will make her first appearance this season on Tuesday night in Montemezzi's tragic opera of mediæval Italy, "The Love of Three Kings." With her will be heard Lucien Muratore, the peerless French tenor, and also Georges Baklanoff and Virgilio Lazzari.

Josef Schwarz will be heard in "Rigoletto" on Wednesday evening. The impression made by Schwarz in the rôle of the Jester was one of the reasons that led Mary Garden to repeat the opera this year. Edith Mason, the American soprano, will sing the rôle of Gilda. One of the operas which is awaited with the greatest of interest is "Salomé," which will afford local music lovers the opportunity to see Mary Garden in one of the rôles which she has made her own. Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" will be revived by the Chicago company for the Saturday matinee on April 8th. The rôle of Dick Johnson will be sung by Ulysses Lappas the young Greek tenor. Lappas sang the part in New York a few weeks ago with remarkable success. Rosa Raisa will be the Minnie of the cast and Giacomo Rimini will impersonate the sheriff, Jack Rance.

Other operas in the repertoire are "Tannhäuser," with Raisa, Van Gordon, Martin, and Schwarz; "The Juggler of Notre Dame," in which Mary Garden will sing, supported by Dufranne and Lazzari; "Romeo and Juliet," with Edith Mason, Lucien Muratore, and Georges Baklanoff; "The Jewels of the Madonna," with Rosa Raisa, Lamont, and Rimini; "Louise," in which Ulysses Lappas will sing Julien to the Louise of Mary Garden; "Madame Butterfly," with Edith Mason in the title-rôle; "Norma," with Rosa Raisa, Irene Pavloska, Forrest Lamont, and Virgilio Lazzari; "La Bohème," with Edith Mason, Irene Pavloska, Edward Johnson, Giacomo Rimini, and Virgilio Lazzari, and "Monna Vanna," with Mary Garden, Lucien Muratore, and Georges Baklanoff.

The Pope's Choir.

The Pope's Sistine Chapel Choir of the Vatican, consisting of fifty-four of the picked voices of Italy, is scheduled to sail tomorrow from Naples on the British P. & O. steamer Naldora for Melbourne, Australia, where on Saturday, April 15th, the choir will commence a concert tour of the Antipodes lasting from eight to fourteen weeks. Following that, it is anticipated that arrangements will have been completed whereby San Francisco and other cities of the Pacific Coast will have a series of twelve concerts, and Manager Frank W. Healy is asking that $45,000 be guaranteed to underwrite them.

His Grace, Edward J. Hanna, Archbishop of San Francisco, R. M. Tobin, secretary of the Hibernia Bank, Mr. W. H. Leahy, proprietor of the Tivoli Opera House, and Mr. A. P. Giannini on behalf of the Bank of Italy have subscribed to the guarantee fund.

The Columbia Theatre.

The Columbia Theatre announces a series of comic opera revivals, to follow Ethel Barrymore. The singing organization recently heard here under the Ralph Dunbar management is to return with added stars. Nearly fifty people will be heard in the opening production of "The Mikado." "Pinafore" also is to be staged. The productions will be complete in every respect, and the numbers will be sung by fresh, young voices.

Ethel Barrymore will enter Monday upon the second week of her present San Francisco engagement in "Déclasseé," at the Columbia.

Godowsky and Kreisler.

Leopold Godowsky, pianist, will give concerts at the Scottish Rite Auditorium on Tuesday night, March 21st, and Sunday afternoon, March 26th, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy.

Fritz Kreisler will be heard in his only recital in Northern California on Easter Sunday, April 16th, at the Exposition Auditorium, under the same local management.

Miss Grace Ewing, contralto interpreter of French folk songs, recently gave a much enjoyed programme before the Ebell Club of Oakland, which comprised songs of the children, legendary folklore, and historical songs.

SIR PHILIP GIBBS AND THE POPE.

A remarkable interview—sympathetic and appraising—with Benedict XV is contained in Sir Philip Gibbs' recent book, "More That Must Be Told" (Harpers). Sir Philip describes how he obtained this unusual honor, and goes into details about the interview, which takes on added significance since the Pope's death:

"I have said that the ideals of the time are the same in the antechambers of the Pope as in the thatched cot of the peasant. That sounds like an affected phrase, yet not long after the war it was in the Pope's own room, and from the Pope himself, that I heard the proof of that. Looking back upon that interview I had with him in the Vatican, I am astonished at the temerity with which I asked for it and the rapidity with which it was granted, for it was against all precedents and contrary to the austere etiquette and privacy which surround the Vatican. My intermediary was a certain Monsignor Ceretti. . . . He laughed heartily when I told him of my desire. 'Impossible!' he said. 'They don't allow journalists, even at a public audience.' 'Of course there was no chance, and I put the idea out of my head until at the Hotel Bristol I received a card permitting me to be received in private audience by Sa Sainteté for twenty minutes, at noon on the following day. The impossible had happened! . . . So through the golden sunlight of an October day in Rome, in the year 1919, I drove in an old carrozza to the Vatican. I felt like a man with a great mission. I was going to get a message which might help the sick old world a little. . . .

"Benedict XV . . . was a simple figure, dressed in white, not so tall as I had expected—a tiny man—and with a scholar's look, a little austere at first glance. Only at a glance, for, after my first salute, and when I asked him for permission to speak in French, he laughed in a genial way, and said, in French also, 'In that language we shall understand each other.' 'Then he took me by the hand and led me to a chair close to his own, so that we sat side by side.

"He asked me about America first, having heard that I had been there not long ago, and then asked me to tell him about the little studies I have been making of the conditions of Europe after the war. . . .

"I noticed that throughout our conversation the Pope's thoughts seemed to be concentrated mostly upon the conditions of the working classes. He spoke of the people rather than of their rulers, and of the poor rather than of the rich.

"When, for instance, I referred again to the strikes and other symptoms of social unrest in many countries, he said: 'The people have been irritated by a sense of injustice. . . . There are many men who have made money out of this war.' 'He made a gesture with his forefinger and thumb, as though touching money, and said: 'Those who grew rich out of the war will have to pay. The burden of taxation will, no doubt, fall heavily upon them.'

"Speaking about the relations between capital and labor. . . . 'All teaching, . . . may be summed up in two words—Justice and Charity. If men behave justly and with real Christian charity toward one another, many of the troubles of the world will be removed. But without justice and charity there will be no social progress.'

"The words he had spoken were not sensational. To be quite truthful, I was disappointed with them. There was nothing in what he had said which would call to the hearts of peoples with trumpet notes, no great cry of pity and appeal, no passion of spiritual leadership. Here was a little, scholarly man, using no high-flown phrases, but talking with keen common sense, sincere interest in the problems of democracy, sadness at the tragedy of the world. . . . Most people would see nothing but platitudes in what he told me. Yet, after all . . . they were platitudes based upon the authority of old and wise tradition, and upon a faith in Christ, and such words spoken by a Pope or by a peasant might fall strangely upon the ears of a world deafened by loud and hostile cries, after a war in which such a phrase as 'Christian charity' was mocked by hatred and cruelty."

Impersonations of Dickens' Characters.

Frank C. Thompson, "a man with many voices," will give an "Impersonation of Dickens' Characters" in the Paul Elder Gallery, Wednesday afternoon, March 15th, at 2:30 o'clock. Mr. Thompson, who interprets almost fifty parts, will give a selection entirely different from that rendered in his highly successful "Afternoon with Dickens" last fall, including such favorites as Mr. Toots, Squeers, Mrs. Gamp, Mrs. Crupp, Scrooge, and Sydney Carton.

"Well, so long," said the aviator, nonchalantly, as he prepared to drop 5000 feet earthward. "Pardon me for mentioning it," said the pilot, "but you haven't hooked on your parachute yet." "Thanks, old top. In another minute I would have been gone without it."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

VANITY FAIR.

In the midst of all the contemptuous criticism that is launched at the modern co-ed, it is a relief to note the message from Miss G. L. White, dean of women at Cornell, who says: "The co-ed today is the same now, yesterday, and forever—the eternal feminine. Girls have changed during the past decade only superficially. They may roll down their stockings, smoke cigarettes, doll up, go petting, discard their stays, and ask boldly what they want to know, but they are the same girls who wore balloon sleeves and danced the two-step to Sousa marches.' This kindly view from one who ought to know is most reassuring. Of course the chief fault with the modern co-ed is the basic fault that she is a woman. It is not that she is a modern, but that she is a co-ed; and not that she is a college girl, but a girl. One should not get away from fundamentals. And yet it is one of her own sex and kind who has dealt her the unkindest blow of all. If co-eds, from Cornell to the University of California, are consoled by the women's dean of the former seat of learning they can nevertheless be only chagrined by the exposure of a junior at the western university. This young woman declares that the average attractive co-ed at Berkeley in particular and at all co-educational colleges generally attains her degree, not by cultivating books, but looks—her own—and not by the study of subjects, always dry and unattractive to the female of the species, but by the much more profitable study of human nature—her prof's. In short, the co-ed's critic at Berkeley maintains that her colleagues work their way through college by vamping. Despite a decent tendency to revolt from any charge including that overworked term, a sense of fairness—entirely divorced from any morbid interest in the subject—compelled one to study Miss Eyre's exposé. Her accusing document is a farce printed in the university paper, the Occident. Astonishingly enough, though Miss Eyre sets out to prove her thesis, that co-eds graduate as a result of vamping rather than of studious research, her farce suggests only the contrary—that the vamping co-ed comes to speedy grief. The moral is a little clouded, but one infers at least that farces should not be weighted with grave charges. They are apt to snap under the strain. Miss Eyre's essay in the thematic farce but proves the statement of the kindly dean of Cornell—that woman is the same in all eras and—dare we say?—at all ages.

There is probably nothing else so fascinating to the average good American as the high sound of titles. Accordingly Mr. Balfour's refusal of a dukedom resounds with even greater magnanimity here than in England. We can understand, of course, why an American citizen should refuse British honors. We point with pride to Sargent's still extant American citizenship. But a Britisher born and bred—! That is incredible. The idea of one of our countrymen refusing a high American honor brings it home with still greater force. The Briton could teach us something in the way of disinterested national service. But as a matter of titular importance the subject has another interest. English aristocrats of great old historic houses have a family pride hard for the American individualist to comprehend. For an Englishman who has inherited the best of British blood to accept a title and a new name is to cast aspersions on what he justly regards as the greater dignity of the old one. For a man to submit to a newly created title implies that he is bettering himself and that he stood in need of aggrandizement. There one has the hauteur of the aristocratic individualist as distinct from his republican colleague, whose glory in new honors suggests to the crudely analogical mind a naive primitive glorying in gifts of wampum. However, there have been more amusing though equally altruistic reasons for declining titles. The late Sir Edward Malet declined the peerage offered him on his retirement from the diplomatic service because acceptance would have lowered the rank of his wife, who, as long as her husband was a commoner, retained the rank and precedence of a duke's daughter. If Sir Edward had been raised to the peerage as a baronet she would have immediately dropped several points in the scale of British precedence. Gladstone declined a peerage, not because of any aristocratic scruple, but because he was denied the title—the Earl of Liverpool—on which his heart was set. Others have declined promotion to the peerage because they could ill afford the upkeep of such a luxury; and still others insist on a life peerage only, to protect their heirs from inherited expense. Mr. Balfour's refusal, however, stands out as one of the most dignified on English record.

The latest, according to Punch, is the dancing breakfast. Not that a déjeuner dansant is more radical than a thé dansante so far as we can see. Dancing, once associated with the hours after dark, has by a simple metamorphosis easily understood by science come to be a recreation associated with meals. If a dinner-dance is a normal affair, why balk at a breakfast dance? Neither one is satisfactory to a person with a healthy appetite, but then exercise should stimulate the jaded appetite and besides who has a healthy hunger any more, anyway? Altogether the breakfast dance ought to catch on. For the benefit of the curious we quote from Punch: "The dancing breakfast is undoubtedly a development that has caught firmly on, especially with the younger generation, although there are some of the older and more conservative school who protest that the dancer's day ought not to begin till luncheon time. As one of the latter sighed the other day, 'If a man can't go to bed in the morning when can he go?' All the same, no week-end hostess who knows her duties neglects to provide a drummer and a saxophone player for those early birds that feel like sandwiching a fox-trot between the porridge and the kippers. The leading restaurants, too, have been prompt to fall in with this movement, and at one or two of them the band is in attendance as early as 8 o'clock for the convenience of the busy ones in these days when it is quite the thing to be busy."

Gallileo discovered the law of the pendulum, and some one else has found regnant in human life such swings as the pendulum makes. We oscillate. The steadiest-looking institutions seem worse than jelly in their instability, worse than water in their impotence to keep a fixed form. Rigidity is not. Children teach their parents, wives govern husbands, and there comes news from Paris that the male sex is now mainly interested in lace bordered handkerchiefs, and stays and cuff ruffs, and contributes the larger half of the customers of the perfumer. It may be the effect of reaction from the Flanders mud and the grime and physical wretchedness of the trenches, but whatever the cause it looks as though man were fixing himself to be courted. Well, it might be a relief, and a solution. Flowers and theatre tickets, and birthday and Christmas and St. Valentine's Day remembrances, to say nothing of the jeweler occasionally, doubtless have, in many matrimonial border-line cases, proved strong deterrents to those whose natural indolence inclined them to bachelorhood. Threats of taxing them to the altar seem unavailing; the brutes are more disposed to pay. But perhaps their repugnance has been, not so much to the velvet-covered chains of domesticity, as the intricate, technical, hazardous, laborious, and often sleep-destroying adventures of courtship. The proper labors of it, added to the normal struggle for existence, would seem to be enough. But there are usually added, we believe, the intense anxieties occasioned by the variant graces and uncertainly provocative charms of the object of pursuit. The man who has been trying to guess the course of the stock market all day, often finds himself called upon to spend part of the evening guessing (or trying to guess, the big stupid) what part of the perfect lover he overlooked yesterday or last week—a part in a code more intricate than free masonry or the Chinese alphabet. For an entire evening the least-experienced flapper can maintain a precarious conversational balance between tickling tantalization and irritant titillation, enough to drive the tired business man into a duck-blind for life. As a matter of reality, however, we understand they soon return for more punishment. For, we can not share the Shavian view that it is woman who now pursues man, netting him in the gossamer snares that so abruptly grow to hempen cables. No doubt the snares are there, but she can only be justly charged at present with luring him into them. If this allurements shall be turned to downright pursuit, the swing of the matrimonial pendulum will be back to its other limit; and the stage of life will be set for some diverting drama; not the least interesting feature of which will be the sport the audience derives from seeing how fast the new quarry purposes to run.

Shackleton's London Clubs.

Sir Ernest Shackleton in the intervals of his expeditions and travels figured a good deal in London life (says the Manchester Guardian). He had a way of being prominent wherever he went. Leadership is a gift which comes out even when there is no leading. He had some family troubles, and took on a burden not necessarily his which handicapped him when he most needed his resources.

Latterly his favorite club was the Marlborough, where he was immensely popular. He created an innovation in that centre of leisure and propriety by conducting a large part of his correspondence and giving interviews there to aspirants after fame who wished to join his expedition.

Another club, a very homely one, in which Shackleton was greatly welcomed was a little dining society in Soho called "The Penguins," consisting of Arctic and Antarctic explorers and some friends interested in their work. Stefansson, Bruce, Young, and many other heads of expeditions were entertained there in a simple and warm way. Shackleton was one of several of the members who died on service. The most loved was little Murray, the oceanographer, who sang many a Scottish song in that low-roofed room with its frieze of penguins painted under the ceiling. He was lost in one of Stefansson's expeditions.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Two Irish-Americans, one of whom had never before seen Erin, were representing the United States at a convention in Dublin. "Fifty-three years ago," declared one, "I left Ireland a naked little boy, without a dollar in me pockets." The audience was greatly affected and the other speaker decided not to be outdone. "Until last week," he orated, "I had never set foot in the land of me birth."

During a sermon recently delivered by a Philadelphia clergyman there were frequent references to "sanctimonious, psalm-singing, professed Christians who have no real religion in their make-up." A lad of ten who had heard the sermon remarked to his father when they returned home: "Dad, I shouldn't have thought Dr. Smith would have spoken that way about Christians this morning. There might have been some of them in church."

The new minister had asked Al Jones to lead in prayer. It was Al's first experience, but, not wishing to disappoint his new pastor, he complied. Twenty minutes later found him still praying. The congregation was becoming restless. Finally, from a deacon's pew, there came a loud and devout, "Amen." Unbending his knees, the supplicant exclaimed, "God bless you, deacon! That's the word I've been trying to think of ever since I started."

A British cyclist rode on through the rain. He was drenched and splashed from head to foot with mud. He saw a countryman walking toward him. "How far to Riston?" he asked. "Eight miles in the other direction," was the answer. "You're going the wrong way," "The other way!" gasped the cyclist. "But the last signpost pointed 'This Way to Riston.'" "Ah, that post was turned around long ago to confuse the Zeppelins," answered the countryman with a knowing smile.

The young New England bride had risen early and descended to the kitchen of the big old Southern home. Mammy Caroline had not yet arrived, and as the young bride watched she emerged from her quarters, and entering the kitchen, began preparations for breakfast. "Why, Caroline!" said her mistress, "aren't you going to wash your face and hands before you start breakfast?" "Lord bless yo', honey," replied the unabashed Caroline, "it don't make me dirty to sleep."

Mrs. M. had arrived at the little station in Vermont on a cold stormy evening and had hired an old man to drive her to her friend's farm up among the hills. The roads were in bad condition from the storm, and the ride was altogether a very uncomfortable one. "How much do I owe you?" she asked on arriving at her destination. "Well, ma'am," said the old man, "my reg'lar price is a dollar, but seein' as it's sech a bad night and the goin' so terrible, I'll call it seventy-five cents."

A Wall Street broker was the father of a small family which he rarely was able to see, as he was too engrossed in making a fortune. One night, however, he was to stay home and take care of the several young offspring alone. The next morning his wife asked him if he underwent any difficulties. "Oh," he said, "I got them all to bed O. K. except that little red-headed one. I had to lick her before she'd go." "Why, John!" his wife exclaimed. "That isn't our child. She lives across the street!"

Cortlandt Bleeker, congratulated at Piping Rock on the smartness of a new lounging suit, said: "London clothes are very good looking, but the trousers are always uncomfortable. They come up nearly to your chin, you know. This cut is supposed to have a corset-like effect and to make the coat set better. A nobleman was once rebuked by the king for the shabbiness of his trousers. 'A man of your rank,' the king said sternly, 'ought to wear better trousers than those.' You'd think the nobleman's answer was a joke, but no—he was speaking the literal truth when he said to the king in a tremulous voice: 'Sir, my trousers may be shabby, but they cover a warm and honest heart.'"

A farmer and his wife were up before a justice of the peace for assault and battery. The complainant was their hired man. The farmer had been beating his wife, when the hired man interfered. The farmer had immediately turned on the hired man, and for a time the two had it nip and tuck. Suddenly the farmer's wife had thrown herself on the hired man, kicking, clawing, and shouting, "What do you mean by interferin'? Guess my ol' man's got a right to beat me if he wants to!" After hearing the testimony, the judge said to the woman: "You must have great esteem and respect for your husband when you will help him beat up a man who has just prevented him from beating you up." "Taint that, jedge," replied the woman, "but 'safety first' is my motto. So long as Jake was a-gettin' th' best of it I said nothin', but when I seed that he was a-tirin' an' thet my ol' man was a-goin' to lick him, I knowed thet if I didn't stick up fer my ol' man I'd a got a good lickin'. 'Safety first' is my motto, jedge."

General Cornelius Vanderbilt, at a dinner on his yacht Romola, told a war story. "What was true of the civil war will be true of the world war some day," he began. "In a hotel smoking-room back in the '90s a number of veterans got into a dispute over a certain battle. The veterans—all men of high rank—argued very turbulently. But a quiet man spoke up and said: 'Gentlemen, I happened to be there at that engagement, and I think I can settle the point at issue.' And settle it he did. The hotel proprietor, much impressed, said to him when he got through: 'My dear sir, what may have been your rank in the army?' 'I was a private, sir, a full private,' was the calm reply. A short time afterward the full private asked for his bill, as he was about to depart, but the proprietor said to him: 'Not a penny, sir! Not a penny! You owe me nothing.' 'Why, how is that?' the other demanded in bewilderment. 'I couldn't dream of charging you, sir,' said the proprietor warmly. 'You are the first private I have ever met.'"

"Have you ever read 'To a Fieldmouse'?" "Why, no! How do you get them to listen?" —Yale Record.

Highly Recommended.

Nan's lips are ever sweet (for Thomas told me so);
Her hands are soft (I think James ought to know);
She likes to hug (at least so Julius said);
She loves to kiss (I got this straight from Fred).
A ring looks swell upon her hand (said Dick);
When she says "yes" she's charming (murmured Nick).
She loves the light real low (I learned from Ned);
Her hair is silky (this I owe to Jed).
She cuddles, oh, so nicely (voiced Eugene);
She clings to one so vinelike (murmured Deane).
Her cheeks are made of velvet (gurgled Van);
Their color ne'er comes off (suggested Dan).
I really feel that with kind words like these—
You folks may view the matter as you please—
That I'm indeed a very lucky man.
To get so versatile a wife as Nan.

Colonial Ancestors of the Volstead Act.

Although the colonial Virginians were hard-riding, hard-drinking, hospitable, and gallant gentlemen, little inclined to brook undue restraints of their personal liberty by legislation, it is recorded that they did at one time attempt to enforce a prohibition measure. In "Potomac Landings" Paul Wilstach tells about the fate of this ancestor of the Volstead Act. "Small 'tipping houses,' probably mere drinking bars, for the refreshment of travelers became so numerous that Virginia passed her first prohibition laws limiting each county to one at the courthouse and one at a public landing or ferry. But the law was not popular and was quickly swept aside, says Mr. Wilstach. The inns and coffee houses were so attractive with their convivial tap rooms that they became an embarrassment to the colonial government, for the clerks in the provincial offices spent far more time tipping at their bars than in recording deeds in the government offices. Jellie's tavern in St. Mary's City, the first capital of Maryland, was so alluring that the council in 1696 requested the mayor and aldermen to suppress it. The legislature also made stringent laws regarding the comfort of the traveler. The St. Mary's bonifaces, according to Mr. Wilstach, were obliged to have at least twenty feather beds, and in their stables they were required to furnish room for at least twenty horses.

"To all those victims of the exorbitant bootlegger who regret the days when a drink was a drink instead of a transaction in high finance the Maryland laws against profiteering in liquors will be interesting. Among the charges fixed by the legislature were: 'Brandy, malaga and sherry, 10 shillings per gallon; canary, 12 shillings; French, Rhenish, Dutch, and English wines, 6 shillings; Mum, 3 shillings; plain cider, 25, and boiled cider, 30 lbs. tobacco per quart.' Lodging in bed with sheets was also fixed at 12 pence, and diet 1 shilling per meal."

"What's all that noise gwine on ovah at yo' house last night?" asked an old colored woman of another. "Sounded like a lot of catamounts done broke loose." "Dat? Why, dat was nothin' only de gen'man from the furniture store collecting his easy payments." —The Bullock Way.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Operatic Lectures

Those who, in a devout spirit, are making preparation for the Chicago Grand Opera season are taking a course in interpretative opera recitals from Sydney Francis Hoben, who travels around the world presenting his interesting opera repertory, with musical selections rendered on the piano. Mr. Hoben's present course of four operas presumably to be sung here in the coming opera season, which is given under the management of Miss Seckels, will conclude with "Tannhäuser" on March 13th and "Norma" on March 16th. His method is to give some particulars of the life and works of the composer, classify his music according to its school, and then graphically tell the story, which is interpolated with selections from the musical score.

A Shaw Play at Berkeley.

"Getting Married," perhaps the most delightful of Bernard Shaw's satirical comedies on marriage, the next production scheduled by the Greek Theatre Players of the University of California, will be performed on Saturday night, March 11th, with repetitions on March 17th and 18th. The production Saturday night, at Wheeler Hall, will feature Irving Pichel in the part of St. John Hotchkiss, which was originally created by William Faversham. Nancy Tyler will play Mrs. Bridgeworth. Other players will be Pamela Tyler, Clayton Lane, Violette Wilson, Harold Minger, Walter Plunkett, Charles Dillman, Edward Hogan, and Mary Morris.

The Next Training Camp.

Major Robert A. Roos, assistant chief of staff of the Ninety-First Division, visited Del Monte and cities on the Monterey peninsula over the week-end to familiarize himself with the proposed site of the training camp to take place in July and August. The camp will be located on a level stretch of ground overlooking the polo fields and race-track. While no definite decision has been rendered, the officials and citizens of the cities on the Monterey peninsula are confident that they will be given an opportunity to assist in the establishment of a very successful camp.

The Powys Lectures.

John Cowper Powys will lecture Sunday evening at the Maitland Theatre on why he considers marriage an experiment in friendship which has nothing to do with love. Powys will touch upon noted divorces in history, especially that of Napoleon and Josephine, and he will bring in the effect of divorce upon the younger generation.

The talks by Mr. Powys on "Books That Live and Die," taking place every Tuesday and Friday morning, also at the Maitland Theatre, under the management of Jessica Colbert, are drawing large audiences.

On Tuesday Powys will lecture on "Moby Dick or the White Whale," by Herman Melville, and "Toilers of the Sea," by Victor Hugo.

A prisoner in court was asked the usual question—"Guilty or not guilty?" "Yes," responded the man at the bar. "What's that?" asked the judge, sharply. "I was asked whether I am guilty or not guilty, and of course I am. Of the two conditions I could not well escape both." "But which are you?" "Oh, go on, judge! What's the jury for?"—Los Angeles Times.

Freedom of the Knees.

A woman professor of Vassar College who has been studying the health of girls for more than a third of a century finds that it is better than it has ever been (says the Portland Oregonian). The girl of today is sturdier, she says, and better able to do a day's work and to withstand disease than her mother was. This may be due in part to greater freedom from drudgery, to the general movement for education in hygiene, to wider opportunity for recreation and particularly to indulgence in outdoor sports, but the professor thinks that the chief reason is reform in dress. The speaker mentions the short skirt. Ten years ago this would have been viewed with horror; five years ago it excited a kind of prurient curiosity in the minds of a few; but it is a sign of our sanity that this stage is quickly passed. Now it is reasonably certain that the old-fashioned garment, which not only swept the streets, but hampered the movements of the wearer, will never return. The Paris fashion-makers have said that it will, but we doubt it. The new freedom means too much to those who have tasted it.

The dean of women of Northwestern University and a woman leader of the Illinois Vigilantes' Association join the professor in pronouncing judgment on the modern girl and in finding her the better for the change which has taken place. "The young woman of today," said the vigilantes' leader, "is morally trustworthy and sound at heart." It is no sign of decay that she has cast aside a restriction upon free movements, any more than it was a token of degeneracy when in larger numbers than ever before in our history she took to wearing sensible shoes. It is now remembered that the vogue of the open-throated waist was hailed with gloomy "scientific" predictions that it would invite respiratory diseases and end eventually in the extermination of the sex. No such thing happened, of course, because fundamentally there was no more reason why a low-neck garment should react unfavorably on a healthy girl than on a sailor. Plenty of fresh air never hurt any one, and freedom of muscular movement is as desirable for a girl as for a boy.

It is now seen that the outcry against the short skirt was largely the product of surprise, or rather of opposition to any inroad on our traditions. The war, which gave a new reputability to knickerbockers and overalls on women, did not establish them as a fashion for reasons which were mostly æsthetic, but it did give emphasis to hygiene, comfort, and convenience, and the shorter skirt was the final compromise. The latter is still with us because it appeals to common sense. This is, as has been suggested, one of the favorable signs of the times. Popular acceptance is already so complete that we can think of nothing that would look more "old-fashioned" than a woman walking down the street wearing a dress that swept the sidewalks as she went along.

Senator Johnson and the Treaties.

Not alone critics of Senator Johnson, but his friends and admirers as well, are profoundly regretful at the course he has taken in the matter of the Conference treaties. It has been the hope of practically everybody in his home state that with respect to this great issue Mr. Johnson might restrain his temperamental bent to opposition and detraction. Here the achievements of the Washington Conference are regarded as of special, in truth of local significance. Our position facing the Pacific Ocean makes it matter of special importance that our relationships with the Eastern front of Asia, particularly Japan, shall be pacific and friendly. Satisfaction here over the adjustment of differences between our country and Japan has been general; and it is most unfortunate that a critic of this adjustment has been found in one whose privilege and whose duty it is to speak for California.

There is further regret that Senator Johnson, by his course with respect to the treaties, is antagonizing the aims and efforts of President Harding. California regards President Harding with cordial approval. It views the course of his administration with something warmer than mere approval. It desires, not only in its own interest, but sentimentally that the hands of Mr. Harding shall be upheld. It is truly matter of chagrin that a man who should voice the sentiment of California in the highest councils of the nation has permitted his unhappy bias of opposition, his instinctive vice of spectacular detraction, to render him blind to his obligations.

It is needless to point out that the highest intelligence of the country desires confirmation of the treaties. In the Senate those who reflect the spirit of patriotism and of moral progress stand for ratification. It is truly a pity that Mr. Johnson has chosen to stand apart from those who represent the will of the country, to ally himself and to make common cause with such chronic malcontents and obstructionists as Senators Borah, La Follette, and Reed. Better was expected of Mr. Johnson even by those of us who from time to time have questioned his capabilities of impersonal judgment and constructive mind.

Senator Johnson's attitude in this matter has a bearing upon the immediate political situation in California. His successor is to be chosen within the current year; and it has been conceded that Senator Johnson should be his own successor. In many minds entirely consonant with this idea recent events have raised a serious question. Is it right that California shall be represented by a man who will not hearken to the judgment and desires of our people? Is it discreet that California through one of its senators shall stand at odds with the Administration? Both the sentiment and interest of California are involved in these queries.

The Treaties in the Senate.

Let nobody in excess of innocence deceive himself with the notion that the Four-Power treaty now before the Senate is being considered upon its merits alone. Things are not done that way in the United States Senate. In legislative bodies—not only in our own country, but in every other—everything stands related to something else. In one form or another, politics and personality enter into consideration of every project, great and small alike. Understanding of what is going on at Washington will be aided by a glance at the situation, including its background of political and personal motives. Not all of these motives are visible, but enough is in view to outline the situation.

First it must be said that the politics behind the contest over the treaties in the Senate is of the peanut variety, narrow, partisan, even factional and wholly disreputable. It proceeds on the Democratic side from a conference held recently by Messrs. Cox, Tumulty, Harrison, and other party leaders, wherein it was decided that the Democratic minority should in every possible way obstruct the Republican majority to the end of confusing and breaking down its legislative programme. Consideration of the treaties and of every other subject bearing the stamp of Republican initiative or approval is to be delayed, hindered, made difficult. Even ex-President Wilson appears to have been brought into this vicious programme, for where he once showed a good spirit, he has now taken the back track in the matter of ratification of the treaties. An effect of this piratical programme was the withdrawal from the following of Senator Underwood of seven of the thirteen Democratic members who voted to ratify the Yap treaty. This, of course, puts Underwood in an awkward position. He is the nominal leader of his party in the Senate; he was a member of the Conference that drafted the treaties; he has undertaken to win co-operation of the Democratic minority for confirmation. Now, according to estimates made at Washington, his following is so reduced that he can only count on six Democratic votes besides his own.

Another phase of the situation is the attitude of chronic objectors on the Republican side of the house to anything and everything that does not originate with themselves. In the matter of the treaties and other things, Senators Borah, Johnson, and La Follette are pursuing their ordinary political tactics. They are oppositionists, if not on principle, at least in obedience to habit. It is their way of making themselves important in the Senate, of exploiting themselves before the country. Vanity, with an innate love for the spectacular, is their main inspiration. One may not speak positively in such matters, but another probable motive is the calculation of getting into such position that the Administration may be brought to pay them to get into line by concessions in the form of patronage. But whatever the motive or combination of motives, there stands the little group of obstructionists making sacrifice of the potentialities and dignity of their country, coöperating with the opponents of the party which they profess to represent and through which, in fact, they came to the posts they occupy.

Most notable of the purely personal considerations behind obstructive tactics in the Senate relative to the treaties is the animosity of the Republican irreconcilables to Senator Lodge. Borah, Johnson, and La Follette have not recovered from a resentment that they have been nourishing now for several years. They have, when human passions are taken into consideration, a certain privilege of dislike for Lodge, who has upon occasion assumed the arrogance of a superior culture and who has more than once exhibited his contempt for these more or less uncombed wild-westerners. However all this may be, the irreconcilable group likes to make things unpleasant for Lodge and would not be chagrined if he should fail to be returned to the Senate. There is an obvious play to bring Lodge out into the open—in other words, to put him into position where he must make an extended argument in support of the treaties. If in the speech which it is sought to compel him to make he shall take the idealistic position, the opposition (Democrats and Republican irreconcilables) will take the materialistic, and vice versa. If Lodge should say anything favorable to Great Britain, as inevitably he must, here would be political ammunition for the Democrats to be used upon the Irish vote in Massachusetts. The irreconcilables seem willing to play the part of tail to this particular kite.

The programme outlined by the Cox-Tumulty-Harrison confab has gone far enough to cut the ground from under Senator Underwood. It has found a very considerable support. As we have already said, of the thirteen Democrats who joined Underwood in voting to ratify the Yap treaty seven are disposed to turn tail and follow the opposition programme as it has been defined. This makes a grave situation. Only thirty-three votes are needed to defeat ratification. Twenty-two are definitely committed in opposition, and with the seven recalcitrants added to the roster runs up to twenty-nine. The margin is perilously small. Only the pressure of public opinion will bring to support of the treaty the necessary two-thirds vote. It is in this situation—a situation in which every vote counts—that Messrs. Borah, Johnson, and La Follette stand arrayed in coöperation with the party to which they are nominally opposed and against the party they nominally represent. They further stand arrayed against the wish of the great mass of intelligent and patriotic people of the United States.

Brother Bryan, always to be depended upon to do the unexpected thing, appeared in Washington last week and at once got in touch with Democratic senators who are opposing ratification. With customary vehemence he declared opposition to the Pacific treaties to be "bad in principle and bad in policy," demanding that Democratic senators turn about and insist upon ratification. How effective Mr. Bryan's appeal may be remains for future determination. Of course, Mr. Bryan could not leave well enough alone. His counsels went beyond the demand for ratification to include one of his familiar pacifist arguments, urging that after the treaties have been ratified the Democrats shall insist on reducing the size of the navy far below the minimum established by the naval limitations treaty

Senator Harrison, who for the moment has usurped Mr. Underwood's powers as leader of the minority, is an interesting character. He has the engaging and altogether likable personality that goes with the name of "Pat." He hails from Mississippi, and the first and last interest of his life is partisan politics. He joys in filibustering and directs that game with the naïve disregard of straightforward candor characteristic of the tricky political ringmaster that he is. No matter what comes before the Senate bearing the Republican trademark, "Pat" is "agin" it. One day it may be a procedure for establishing the budget system; the next it may be something tending to obstruct procedure to the same end. It is all the same to "Pat." He is a "Dimmycrat," and whatever may tend to delay or embarrassment to the Republican legislative programme "Pat" falls heavily upon it with both feet.

In the meantime President Harding, having done everything in his power to recommend the treaties to the Senate, having pointed out the consequences of their failure, having declared that he will "neither lobby, trade, supplicate, nor admonish," has gone South for a brief vacation. There is dignity in a course that leaves to the Senate the responsibility that attaches to it under the Constitution. It is for the Senate to determine whether the United States government is or is not capable of functioning in the sphere of international affairs. More specifically, as the situation stands, it is up to three nominally Republican senators—Messrs. Borah, Johnson, and La Follette—to determine this great and vital issue. These three men can not fail to know that public sentiment favors adoption of the treaties; and if they shall continue to stand in opposition it will be in contempt of views and courses they are in honor bound to represent.

Witchcraft at Chico.

It is likely that the appetite for signs and wonders is only exceeded by the thirst for light wines and beers. There is a type of mind, and if it is not in the majority it represents at least a very large minority, that seems to need something supernatural to think about, and to believe in. It has not thus far been possible for rationalism to catch up with the birth rate, and so there is an active market for modern miracles. At one time the best people took a hand in the hanging of witches, or approved the practice when indulged in by the grim pietists of that day. Today, the prevailing disposition is not sanguinary, nor igneous, but wondering, and perhaps grateful for something at which to wonder. As long as credulity takes this harmless form it may be regarded with charity and tolerance, until we get better schoolteachers.

In addition, most people like to guess. Hence the profits made by the composers of puzzles, who minister at least to the great recreative instinct of the race. Fishing has its closed seasons, but guessing is open all year. At the pleasant little town of Chico, in Butte County, the guessing has recently been very good, the wondering and believing of the best quality. Last Sunday a lot of people who had long been puzzled about Jonah and the whale and where Cain got his wife seem to have given it up and flocked to Chico in their automobiles to guess at the origin of the showers of stones that have piqued curiosity for the past two months.

It appears that Mr. Charge owns a warehouse; and from time to time its iron roof resounds to the impact of a cobble; sometimes a whole volley. Mr. Charge can not explain it. The petrological dew may fall at any hour, but the downfall is more likely to occur at 11 a. m., or 2 p. m. The direction whence the stones come is unknown. The town marshal put on his star and examined the heavens, but to no avail. An operative psychologist, as distinguished from a mere empiric, or faculty psychologist, rushed to the scene from San Francisco. He searched a number of witnesses and set down their answers in a note-book thoughtfully brought along for the purpose, but could find no material or mundane explanation. Because of this negative finding, the positive conclusion is now established in the minds of many that this is a business of spirits, a proper study for the Society of Psychological Research, perhaps for the speculations and explanations of Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Camille Flammarion, or some other restless intellect unsatisfied with physical causes. The operative psychologist has encountered competition of the gravest character, for a negro woman medium has offered, for a price, to stop the cobblefall, and is willing to forego payment until it has ceased for forty-eight hours. Nothing could be fairer.

Human, and physical, explanations have been offered in abundance, but they are not desired. They are regarded as faith-destroying, and hence sinful. Credulity appears to be the primal instinct of our race. As far as we know, the horses, cows, and elephants are not gifted with it. Dogs seem to have it to some degree, for they believe in the goodness of men, despite the persecutions of women. But in human beings it springs eternal, like the hope of which it is probably a supporting part.

There are those who have believed in banshees. Others have believed in the "precipitation of matter," whereby, in defiance of physical law, matter of one sort has penetrated matter of another sort, and, as mist, has passed clean through it, to reorganize on the other side. Some believe in spirit photographs, admitting they might be produced by double exposures, but certain they are not. Long before photography the sect of Ophalopsychites, if that is the way to spell it, believed that by sitting in one posture and gazing at the umbilicus until their overstrained optic nerves began to play strange tricks they could see the "light of Mt. Tabor," which illuminated the Transfiguration; and the kennels of Constantinople ran blood about that. Some have believed in the fourth dimension. Others have believed in the "lost Atlantis," sunk somewhere out in the roaring ocean by the subsidence that formed the latter, although it was not formed that way. Others have believed that the American Indians were the ten lost tribes of Israel, although those ten lost tribes were merely swallowed up in the surrounding ragamuffins on the fringe of Judea. Others have believed that the ancient Egyptians could poke a stick in the ground and concentrate on it enough energy to build the Pyramids—something the Pacific Gas and Electric Company would probably pay handsomely to know how to do. Others have believed the dried blood of St. Janarius of Naples liquifies at a certain time, and grow quite abusive of the saint if he is slow with the miracle. Others have believed the Cardiff Giant was a petrified man, and refused to be undecieved when the roysterers that made it of gypsum confessed the fraud. Others have believed that Bacon wrote Shakespeare, because the general understanding is that he did not. Others believed that a mysterious and hence supernatural wind blew out of the forehead of Eusapia Palladino and stirred her hair, even after Joseph Rinn stopped it by putting his hand across her mouth.

It is amusing, and it is pathetic. People have the will to believe largely because they are dissatisfied with anything that can be known. Belief is rosy and romantic. Science is hard and dry. The Argonaut has, of course, its own theory about the Chico rockfall. But why break down all that beautiful faith in the work of malignant spirits? Why put an end to all the good guessing?

A Peasant Born Pope.

Pope Pius XI is the son of Francesco Ratti, an Italian weaver. His mother was Teresa Galli Ratti, like her husband a peasant. This fact is interesting as illustrating the democratic background of an aristocratic system that has sustained itself through centuries. The organization of the Catholic Church is essentially aristocratic in character in a sense that it is in the hands of an autocratic group, based upon aristocratic models, and proceeds upon aristocratic traditions. It differs from other aristocracies in a sense that it is recruited from merit drawn from every rank, class, and caste. Its special and particular virtue and the principle of its continuing strength lies in the fact that the rule of heredity has no part in it. Aristocracies in ordinary social organizations are recruited under the hereditary principle. The son of a duke becomes a duke; the son of a lord becomes a lord. Personal character, individual competence, make no figures in the case. It is at this point where aristocracies fail. Human quality under the privileges of rank and luxury inevitably declines. And it is for this reason that aristocracies commonly wither through intellectual and moral vacuities to nothingness. The system of the Catholic organization has a sounder basis in that it seeks talent wherever it may be found, bringing to the hierarchy the best from everywhere, even installing upon the throne of St. Peter a man peasant-born but worthy under the tests of individual merit.

Editorial Notes.

Lawyers representative of all sections of the state have taken it upon themselves to advise the public in the matter of the coming election of judges of the Supreme Court. This action is not only within the bounds of propriety, but a notable aid to public judgment. Nobody knows so well what the qualifications of judges of the Supreme Court, or of any court, should be as the lawyers of the state. Chief Justice Shaw, ex-Chief Justice Angellotti, ex-Judge Slack, Messrs. Devlin, Dunne, Sullivan, and their associates deserve, not criticism, but thanks for the interest they have taken in this vastly important matter. Even those who declare their preference to be "free" in the matter of choice for judges have no basis of just criticism. No man is freer than the man who is willing to receive and act upon expert counsels.

President Harding's determination that the railroads and the "essential utilities" shall be "kept going," no matter what the trainmen's unions or the coal miners' unions shall threaten to do, is one of practical wisdom and of executive duty. It is in recognition of the "party of the third part"—that is, of the public interest—which is of greater importance than the private interest of trainmen or coal miners. It is further right that the public should be assured in advance that its interest will be protected and that prospective strikers shall also know in advance that they will not be permitted in selfishness and recklessness to prosecute their demands at the public cost.

Secretary Hughes' statement that he was personally the author of the Four-Power Pact in its original form is of course conclusive with orderly-minded and decently-minded persons. Whoever questions Mr. Hughes' candor in the matter lacks something that is elemental in dignity and decency; and what is more, writes himself down as one whose passions have overwhelmed both his judgment and his taste. However, the important question in relation to the Four-Power Pact is what it is and what it stands for. What hand wrote it is a matter of secondary interest, or of none at all. When Senator Borah and his associated crew of mad obstructionists seek to make question of the authorship of the document rather than of what it says, they exhibit themselves in the character of demagogues and charlatans eager to play upon the passions and prejudices of ignorance and stupidity.

It is made plain by those who speak, if not with authority at least with judgment, that President Harding will not approve any measure providing a cash bonus for service men unless it shall make the necessary provision for funds. That such provision can not be made without serious embarrassment of the finances, and therefore of the essential interests of the country, is now manifest. It is further manifest that Congress will not provide the money by the only method of which the President will approve. In this situation what will be the course of Congress? We can only guess. The House of Representatives is in a panic, due to fear on the part of its membership of the "soldier vote." In this situation the House of Representatives is likely to pass a bonus bill with no provision for meeting its demands. In all likelihood the bill will "hang up" in the Senate. But if the Senate, in fear of reprisals from the soldier vote, should join with the House and pass such a bill as is proposed, then the President may be expected to veto it. He put a stop last year to precipitate action and will probably do it again. In the meantime the country is coming to see this whole proposal in its true light—as a moral issue. A large self-respecting element of service men is making its voice heard in protest. It is too soon to say that the project may ultimately break down of its own weight, but it is certain that the current is now running that way.

The picturesque island of Mont Saint Michel (Normandy) appears to be jeopardized as the result of a landslide which has occurred there. The main street of the island has given way, leaving a gap twenty-five feet wide by twenty feet long. Engineers have been summoned to carry out an examination of the foundations of the beautiful old abbey which crowns the rock, as it is feared that the landslide may extend to the vaults on which the abbey stands.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

From a Visitor to San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 11, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: A stranger in this fair city is almost bewildered by the many things of which it can be justly proud; its beautiful bay, its unique situation, the life and animation of its streets, and the courtesy and hospitality of its people. But, if I may without impertinence, I would like to congratulate San Francisco upon its possession of two things of graver importance; first, its citizen who wrote the letter signed Mark Gerstle in the Argonaut; second, the Argonaut itself. This is the only paper I have seen which has lifted the discussion of the bonus to the soldiers out of the sordid level of dollars to the place where it belongs, the higher level of the moral side of the question.

Shall America give a "tip" to those splendid youths whose dash and courage won the whole-hearted admiration of all who had the good fortune to see at close range what America could send to us?

We are old and tired nations in Europe, our traditions are the growth of centuries; we have not America's opportunity of starting upon the building of a tradition for the glory of the sons and grandsons of the boys who were in France. They came gallantly to our assistance, eager, cheerful, gay; a charming breeziness of manner covering, as we at the front instantly realized, the dauntless spirit of self-sacrifice. To each one it must have meant a step toward a high ideal, a step which they might never have taken in their comfortable, peaceful lives at home. How cruel, then, to tear from their young eyes that fair vision of something better than the material side of life and—pay them! If duty (not "pay") be the soul of the tradition carried down to the sons and the sons' sons of these youths, then America can rest proud and secure in the knowledge that if ever it is her fate—as it was England's—to decide between an ignoble safety and honor at any sacrifice, the country will be behind her—for honor.

I have rejoiced to hear many of the boys who came home unscathed deplore the fact that the "bonus" question was ever raised. "We can work," they say; "give anything you like—the more the better—to the wounded and disabled." The daring "doughboy" of France is no less daring in America when he "hustles" to make up for lost time and "get ahead" in his life's work. He is willing and able to fend for himself, and would be the first to cheer on the solons in Washington if they would spend all their efforts towards greatly assisting those splendid boys who have been brought home—broken.

Problems of Transportation.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 11, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: No problem of graver consequence confronts the country than that of the railroads, as is evidenced by the constantly increasing public attention that it commands. In the Argonaut of March 4th an interesting excerpt appears from a speech of the always interesting Charles M. Schwab to the Ohio Society.

Mr. Schwab makes eloquent plea in behalf of the railroads, the gist of which is to let the dead past bury its dead and whatever was done in the past to let bygones be bygones. Every one will agree with Mr. Schwab; the only difficulty in meeting this view seems to be the impossibility of doing so. Mr. Schwab stated he had been told that the railroads needed at least five billions to place them in condition to handle efficiently the transportation of the country. Should the additional strain of a revival of business and a return of prosperity be put upon the rails, while in their present physical condition, Mr. Schwab believes that it could but result in a paralysis in transportation that would materially abate that prosperity.

This is not only all and sadly true, but it is probably even more indigo-hued than Mr. Schwab has painted it. The late James J. Hill, who had the habit of startling and unpalatable truth, some fifteen years ago said in an interview that caused both a sensation and consternation that at that time the railroads needed nine billions to rehabilitate them. The chances are that they need more now than they did then.

From the ninety-seven billion ton miles hauled by the railroads in 1890 Mr. Daniel Willard stated last year that in 1920 they had been called on to haul some 450 billion ton miles. An even more disquieting fact was revealed by the Railway Age, which stated that an analysis of the statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission from 1903 to 1920 proved that a locomotive in the last-named year hauled almost 20 per cent. less in car mileage than it did seventeen years before.

When it is remembered that one carload in every seven hauled by a locomotive must be fuel for its own use and that but 6 per cent. of that fuel can be turned into energy and 94 per cent. is waste, it makes the Railway Age's disclosure ominously disagreeable. These and other things it is that make it difficult to let bygones be bygones, for overcapitalization in the past is in part responsible for the inability of the railroads to finance their needs in the present.

Mr. R. B. Swayne in a letter to the Argonaut in its issue of February 25th gives another angle and offers a solution to the California end of the problem. Mr. Swayne attributes the financial difficulties of both the railroads and electric railways to the competition of commercialized motor transportation. To drive motor buses and trucks from the highways Mr. Swayne apparently believes would, as he puts it, conserve our beautiful highway system and preserve the steam and electric railways. The haul for which the motors compete is of course the short one. It was a fast contracting one with the railroads from a variety of causes long before motor competition put in its appearance. Mr. Swayne states that the trucks, freight and passenger, amounting to but 5 per cent. of the highway traffic, do more damage to the highways than the other 95 per cent. do. This seems hardly possible, as there are but 35,000 trucks and over 650,000 automobiles in the state. But even if it is, the tests at Pittsburg, California, on the experimental highway prove that it is the freight truck, and not the passenger bus, that is to blame.

The passenger buses because of their long wheel bases (from 190 to 220 inches), shock absorbers, and other devices, do little if any greater damage to the highway at the speed at which they are run than do privately-owned automobiles. A loaded bus deflected the slab .008 inches standing still. This deflection lessened at various speeds to .004 inches at thirty miles. A 120-inch wheel based, solid-tired truck, with the same weight, showed approximately twice the deflection. The explanation given was that "under thirty miles an hour the short wheel bases give a cumulative effect to impact. When the front wheels strike an uneven place the weight is thrown up and, on the short wheel base, comes down just in time to double upon the impact as the rear wheels strike the obstruction." Any one who has led a cup and ball existence in the tonneau of an automobile, while those in the driving seat rode in unbounded comfort, knows from experience the force and discomfort of this double impact.

Of one angle of this form of transportation Roger W. Babson, the economic authority, recently wrote:

"That there is going to be a great change from the ordinary street railway service to motor bus service is inevitable. * * * Engineers and bankers hesitate to finance bus systems because they fear that the inauguration of this kind of service will adversely affect their present investment in tractions. Unfortunately the interests which control our street railway systems feel that any encouragement of the motor bus would ultimately result in harm to them and to their profession. This is of course short-sighted, but it is probably human."

These are but an angle or two of the railroad problem, which seems to have as many as a porcupine has quills. The only thing that is at present certain in the future of the railroads is that their problem will be solved because it must be.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

From Mr. E. W. Putnam.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 10, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: It was with extreme disappointment that I read your words concerning the judgment of certain citizens against the use of Strawberry Cañon as a site for the Stadium. I shall simply quote a few words of my friends, Professor Rieber and Bruce Porter, trusting that you will give their thought its properly controlling place in this matter. All that I enclose has been quoted in the daily papers:

"And often I have visioned that cañon developed without serious injury to its natural beauty for the higher spiritual and intellectual uses of the university."

"The project is therefore a shocking waste of the university's present and future resources."

Professor Rieber is one of our very best men.

Very sincerely, E. W. PUTNAM.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 13, 1921.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The responsibility of the regents of the University of California in the choice of the site of the new stadium is, to the citizen who looks beyond the present, a very heavy one.

If, now, the choice of the regents is for the destruction of the finest natural feature possessed by any seat of learning in America, that choice will mean that this institution, so devotedly built up by the best intelligences of the community and so unquestioningly supported by every citizen taxpayer, who trusted these leaders and had faith in the use and value of the higher education, this institution is to be suddenly committed to the lower purpose of a university blown big by the spirit of boosting advertisement, of size and excitement, a place for the gathering of vast congregations of people to "hurrah" in the interests of competitive sport.

A stadium is of course to be built; it is to be part of a generous provision for the legitimate activities of youth. But to glorify a side issue, a relaxation, by the destruction of irreplaceable natural beauty, is to deliberately change the destiny of the university from a place for the cultivation of the higher faculties and inclinations in young men and women; to change the established centre for the ideals of all the citizens of the state into a place where, by this very example of ruthless destruction, the best is not fostered nor conserved and where the immediate second rate is put above all the lasting satisfactions and rewards.

This is not a decision to be governed by the undergraduate desire to "put one over on Stanford." The regents are above such childishness. They are, we trust, to prove that they know themselves to be the trustees for the whole future of the University of California.

BRUCE PORTER.

A Veteran's Protest Against the Bonus.

PHILADELPHIA, March 9, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I enclose herewith my check covering renewal subscription to the paper for a period of one year.

I notice with interest the letter written by Mr. Mark L. Gerstle in your issue of February 25th. The pending legislation in Washington on the subject of adjusted compensation is bad in principle. It seems to me that Mr. Gerstle has clearly set forth in the letter above referred to an argument which attacks in principle the proposed legislation.

I had the honor to serve as a member of the American Expeditionary Forces in a combat division, and it is my feeling that if properly appealed to the former members of combat organizations could see that the attempt on the part of the American Legion to put this legislation through in Washington will ultimately work against the best interests of the vast majority of people in this country.

May I in closing commend the action that the Argonaut has taken in doing its bit to show the country by and large how dangerous this legislation may be, and, in my opinion, how un-American?

Yours, very truly,

DAVID E. WILLIAMS, JR.

A Bonus Inflation Bill.

(Philadelphia Inquirer.)

Whatever may be the merits of the Bonus proposal certainly the bill prepared by the Ways and Means Committee is the worst that has been suggested. In the first place, it utterly ignores President Harding's statement that he would approve no bill of the kind which did not carry in it means for raising the necessary revenue, and a sales tax is his only suggestion. Evidently Republican leaders are going to rush the bill through the House simply to save their faces in the coming election, although they do not expect it to pass the Senate.

As at present drawn the bill might be properly called an act to inflate the currency by $2,000,000,000, since that is what it amounts to. Under the bill every veteran, to whom $50 or less is coming, is to receive cash, although there is no cash in sight for the purpose. Some others may accept vocational training or help in getting farms and homes, for which also there is no money provided; but the great majority will receive Certificates of Indebtedness from the treasury on which all banks are authorized to loan 50 per cent. of the face value at interest not exceeding 2 per cent. above the Federal Reserve rate of the district.

Now there is no possible compulsion upon banks to loan money on this collateral, but it is likely that under pressure most of them will do so. This means that so much money will be withdrawn from commercial purposes and the banks will have to get heavy discounts at the Federal Reserve banks, although the veterans' paper is not eligible. It is conservatively estimated that this will eventually require an inflation of the currency by at least $2,000,000,000. Nothing could be more disastrous than this. The currency issued does not represent any constructive purpose whatever, is not to help commerce or industry, but to cover frozen loans which it will take years of taxation to pay.

We submit that this is an impossible measure. If we must pay a bonus it should be paid out of taxation. To tie up the finance and industry of the country by inflating the currency as proposed would be the most serious blow the nation has ever received in times of peace. It would be disastrous.

THE TROUBLE IN INDIA.

Religious Complications Make It of Serious Moment to a Troubled World.

The week saw Sir Edwin Montagu out of the cabinet and Mahatma Ghandi in jail, wherewith Ghandi becomes the Eugene Debs of the British Empire, and India attains evil eminence as a trouble centre of the first rank. And there is nothing in its history to indicate that if it once set out to be a trouble centre it would long be satisfied with a position in the second rank.

There may be no truth in the legend, but the spirit of India, if there is such a thing, is probably best presented to the imagination by the story of the sad and beautiful end of Gotama Buddha, to the effect that in pursuit of a spiritual ideal he fed himself to a hungry tigress so that she might furnish milk to her cubs; thereby reducing the number of men and increasing the number of tigers. A policy that works out that way is about the sort of statecraft that would naturally appeal to Ghandi and his idealistic followers.

For, India is a strange world. Its inhabitants probably know more things that are not so than any similar mass of men except the passing generation of the Chinese. The Prussian historian, Treitschki, propagating hatred of Great Britain by emphasizing her "oppression" of India, said: "Religion? Why India is religion!" In the opinion of some persons that is what is the matter with it. Her people exhibit astonishing faiths, astonishing powers of logical reasoning from false premises to worse conclusions, astonishing lack of any saving sort of pragmatism throughout their many so-called philosophies. They live their creeds, and they have too many. They try to make them a guide to life instead of leaving them conveniently checked in the mosque or the temple when worship is over. The result is a worse confusion of thought and purpose than would ordinarily be indicated by the statement that there are 700 native states; that seventy of them, inhabited by 70,000,000 people, are still governed by hereditary native sovereignties; that there are 315,000,000 people in the peninsula, only about 16,000,000 of whom can read and write; that they speak more than forty languages divided into 145 dialects; and that the Hindu part of the population is separated into more than 2300 castes, with innumerable branches, the technique of whose obstructive and worthless restrictions and prescriptions and pollutions and disabling defilements and expensive purifications it has proved beyond the patience of any ordinary European to learn. Social anarchy and waste of time and energy could hardly go farther, and until Ghandi arose about the only unifying process India ever knew came in the form of subjugation: a mode which, of course, has not been peculiar to that unhappy region.

Into this apparently hopeless mess the English, in devious and immoral ways, intruded, but once under the load of responsibility they carried it like Englishmen, and established some measure of administrative unity over more than 200,000,000 of these warring people. Since the British went into India and stopped the wars and violence and ritualistic murder and general crime, and took steps to hold down the famines and plagues, the population has increased by 100,000,000, or almost the population of the United States. Of the whole people, 66,000,000 are fighting Mohammedans, and about 60,000,000 are pariahs, outcasts, eaters of beef, denied even the use of the roads because they pollute at sixty-four feet.

In addition to its bad sanitation and its natural political chaos, India has the evil financial reputation of being the "sink of silver"; also the sink of gold, and gems and portable wealth of all sorts. It has always been a country where money was hoarded instead of being put to legitimate capitalistic use. Hence its general poverty and the wretchedness of its masses, side by side with the fact that since the days of Alexander it has been a good country for military conquerors to attack and plunder. Even after the establishment of the British raj, this hoarding habit persisted, along with the castes and creeds, so that being without any open, general money market, interest rates have been villainously high and the usurer has flourished. That was another thing the English attended to, at least far enough to promote the physical progress of the country on a large scale. They capitalized development, mainly from London, so that irrigating canals and railroads could be built, and famine and plague and other evils laid under intelligent control; a thing the native Indians, in their ignorance and corruption, were as helpless to do for themselves as the natives of the Napa State Hospital would be. Capitalization means civilization—always has, always will. British control has meant British capital and British rates of interest. It is true that by contrast with the fairy-like Hindu and the stately Mohammedan architecture, some of the larger British railway stations have been architectural horrors, suggesting Vancouver, or Buffalo, or St. Louis; but the people don't usually get much nutriment from Pearl Mosques and Taj Mahals and silver bridges over the Jumna. In the decade between 1901 and 1911 the population grew from 294 millions to 315 millions. That many more persons were enabled in an already overcrowded country to survive and subsist. Yet in many of the bazaars today Englishmen are not safe, and recently an American named Doherty was beaten to death because he was a white man.

Progress brought discontent. The present Indian troubles do not, as many suppose, date from the world war. Railroads, mails, newspapers, intercommunication of facts and ideas, produced a national consciousness. Even the pariahs are rebelling against their ancient ostracism. The thing has been brewing for twenty years, instead of five. Of course, the world war was a precipitant, and President Wilson's doctrine of self-determination did not greatly soothe these discontents. But they are old, and have been long forming and growing. Exactly what is going on there is not clear in detail. There has evidently been considerable suppression of news. But here and there a wisp of smoke betrays the smothered fires. We have heard a little of the terrible Moplah uprising. We know that Mr. Ghandi has incited some sort of resistance, non-violent in any declared purpose, but resulting in the combined Hindu and Moslem hoodlums of Bombay falling on the helpless Parsees and butchering many of them. He fasted for that, but it did not resuscitate a single dead Parsee. Just how far-reaching his plans have been was indicated recently by one of his more moderate followers, Sir Sankaran Nair, who thus described his "demands": the government must show penitence by releasing all political prisoners; Sir Michael O'Dwyer and General Dyer and others must be deprived of their pensions; Great Britain must evacuate Egypt, and France must give up Syria. India must have full dominion status at once. These demands Sir Sankaran Nair calls impossible. But Ghandi gave the Viceroy seven days to comply, and secure compliance, before starting his "civil disobedience," including the general refusal to pay taxes. The Viceroy said the demands were such as no government could even discuss, much less accept, and continued: "The issue is no longer between this or that programme of advance, but between lawlessness with all its dangerous consequences and the maintenance of those principles which lie at the root of all civilized government. Mass civil disobedience is fraught with such danger to the state that it must be met with sternness and severity." In other words, running the Prince of Wales around to a few official receptions through lines of lean, brown vegetarians stimulated with claque enthusiasm is not going to meet the situation at all.

And the Ghandi demands throw into strong light the world importance of his movement. It is not India alone that is affected. That might easily and bloodily be dealt with. But he has formed a junction of his Hindus with the Moslem element, and when you touch that you wake up a large, irritable passenger on this rather poorly operated planet. Islam is international, to a far greater extent than Socialism ever will be. It is an explosive religion. It stretches from Timbuctoo to Mindanao, and is in a beautifully strategic position for blowing up the world. It is entirely possible that because of its Moslem population, and the uncomfortable position of Turkey, and the British-promoted independence of the Hedjaz with its holy Mohammedan places, and the British-encouraged movement to make Palestine, with still more Mohammedans, a national home for the Jewish people—it is entirely possible that India, and not Russia, is the most critical trouble area of the world today.

Comes now the publication by the Earl of Reading, authorized by his chief, the visionary Montagu, of the message urging the restoration of Constantinople, Thrace, and Smyrna to the Turks, and the recognition of the suzerainty of the Sultan over the Moslem holy places—which would mean the virtual subjugation of the Hedjaz, and probably Zion, to a renovated Porte. And South Africa in ferment, and British labor in worse ferment, and the Paris conference on the Near East problems, including the French protectorate over Syria, set for March 22d! No wonder there is added bitterness between liberal and conservative elements of the coalition government. No wonder Lloyd George has jounced Montagu out of the cabinet. No wonder he had to go to Wales for a rest; if the Welsh miners will let him. No wonder there is talk of the resignation of the Earl of Reading. Sitting on the world has a fine sound, but this looks as though the British had been trying to do it too literally and too extensively.

But India is their job now. The consequences of anarchy would be too terrible to contemplate, and so would the consequences of a great Mohammedan uprising against the weary Western populations of Europe. Should India be fit to be free? Certainly. Is it? That is another question. F. M. T.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 15, 1922.

The slutation of English-speaking races of shaking hands is very ancient. It is mentioned by Homer, Aristophanes, and by Virgil. As the confirmation of a bargain, it appears in II Kings x:15. It is nevertheless practically relegated to the Anglo-Saxon races today.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Father Joseph M. Denby of Marion, Ohio, establishes a precedent in being appointed by President Harding as consul-general to Tangiers, Morocco. He is the first Catholic priest to be named by this country for a diplomatic post.

E. Alexander Powell has been made a commander of the Order of the Crown of Roumania by the King of Roumania in recognition of his book, "The New Frontiers of Freedom," an account of post-war conditions in the Balkans.

President Walter Dill Scott of Northwestern University, an authority on the psychology of advertising, was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal for his work as director of the committee on classification of personnel in the army during the world war.

Among eminent recent sitters to the fashionable portrait painter, Philip de Laszlo, are General Pershing, Mr. Elihu Root, and Chief Justice Taft. Mr. de Laszlo has been engaged to paint the President and his Cabinet, a picture which will probably be hung in the Cabinet room of the executive offices.

Another honor was conferred on General Pershing when the University of Pennsylvania bestowed the degree of Doctor of Laws upon him. At the same time Sir Arthur William Currie, former commander of the Canadian expeditionary forces and now president of McGill University, was similarly honored by the same institution. The ceremony took place in Philadelphia on Washington's Birthday.

Mrs. Harding is establishing many claims to pre-eminence in her exalted rôle, but she has one which is just reaching public knowledge. This is her indefatigable zeal in learning of illness or bereavements in the official set and in her own large circle of friends. While almost all of her predecessors have been content to send a line of condolence or sympathy in the event of grief, and of congratulation on those happier family occasions, the present mistress of the White House "says it with flowers" as well.

Dr. Hugo A. Rennert, professor of romantic languages at the University of Pennsylvania, has been decorated by the King of Spain "in recognition of his work in promoting the Spanish language and culture." The honor conferred upon him was "Knight Commander of the Royal Order of Isabel the Catholic." The letter accompanying the declaration declared that it was bestowed to show the appreciation of the Spanish people for the notable service Dr. Rennert has rendered in America in behalf of the culture and language of Spain.

Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt sailed recently for what seems her annual pilgrimage to the grave of her son Quentin and to visit some of the adjacent cemeteries where American soldiers are buried. She belongs to one of the committees that have in charge the floral adorning of these graves. The wife of the former President will, however, during this sojourn abroad carry out an intention that has been in mind for some years—that of visiting the Holy Land to spend the Easter season. She and the late Colonel Roosevelt had planned this just before he died, in January, 1919. Conditions have been such that only now can his widow make the more extended part of the journey.

Edward Julian Nally, president of the Wireless Corporation of America, a subsidiary of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, began life as a messenger boy with the Western Union Telegraph Company in 1875. For the next few years he filled various positions till in 1890 he became general superintendent of the Western Division, Postal Telegraph Cable Company, a position he held till 1906. He became director of the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company in 1913. He opened the first commercial wireless circuit between the United States and Hawaii in 1914; extended it to Japan in 1916, and between the United States and Great Britain, 1920. The future of American commercial wireless is said to lie largely in the hands of Mr. Nally and the Wireless Corporation of America.

Sir Gordon Hewart, British attorney-general, is one of the men behind the scenes in British politics. It is said that practical politicians count him one of the four most important men in the United Kingdom and that the reason he did not attend the Washington Conference was because, like Lloyd George, he could not be spared. Gordon Hewart launched into journalism when he "came down" from Oxford in 1891. He was chiefly engaged on the now defunct Morning Leader. A too sensitive conscience is said to have caused him to forego the drudgery of a journalistic career when he made the remarkable choice of the law for a conscientious substitute. He was called to the bar in 1902; was solicitor-general, 1916-19; and has been attorney-general since the latter date. Sir Gordon is a Liberal in British politics. He was knighted in 1916.

Among the many recent embassy shifts are the following important transfers: Warren Delano Robbins, now chief of the Far Eastern Division of the State Department, is to be counselor of the American Embassy at Berlin. Elridge Gerry Green, now at Sofia, is to be secretary of embassy at Paris, and Norval Richardson, now at Lisbon, is to be secretary of the embassy at Tokyo. Francis White, first secretary of the embassy at Buenos Aires, is transferred to the Department of State. Jefferson Patterson of the Department of State is to be transferred to the legation at Peking; and Percy Blair, also of the State Department, to Buenos Aires. Stokely W. Morgan, first secretary of the legation at La Paz, is to be first secretary of the legation at Berne. William Walker Smith, now at Berne, is to be first secretary of the legation at Tegucigalpa.

Fancy.

Ever let the Fancy roam,
Pleasure never is at home:
At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth,
Like to bubbles when rain pelteth,
Then let winged Fancy wander
Through the thought still spread beyond her:
Open wide the mind's cage-door,
She'll dart forth, and cloudward soar.
O sweet Fancy! let her loose;
Summer's joys are spoilt by use,
And the enjoying of the Spring
Fades as does its blossoming:
Autumn's red-lipp'd fruitage too,
Blushing through the mist and dew,
Cloy with tasting: What do then?
Sit thee by the ingle, when
The sear faggot blazes bright,
Spirit of a winter's night;
When the soundless earth is muffled,
And the caked snow is shuffled
From the ploughboy's heavy shoon;
When the Night doth meet the Noon
In a dark conspiracy
To banish Even from her sky.
Sit thee there, and send abroad,
With a mind self-overawed,
Fancy, high-commission'd!—send her!
She has vassals to attend her:
She will bring, in spite of frost,
Beauties that the earth hath lost;
She will bring thee, all together,
All delights of summer weather;
All the buds and bells of May,
From dewy sward or thorny spray;
All the heaped Autumn's wealth,
With a still, mysterious stealth:
She will mix these pleasures up
Like three fit wines in a cup,
And thou shalt quaff it:—thou shalt hear
Distant harvest-carols clear;
Rustle of the reaped corn;
Sweet birds antheming the morn:
And, in the same moment—hark!
'Tis the early April lark,
Or the rooks, with busy caw,
Foraging for sticks and straw.
Thou shalt, at one glance, behold
The daisy and the marigold;
White-plumed lilies, and the first
Hedge-grown primrose that hath burst;
Shaded hyacinth, alway
Sapphire queen of the mid-May;
And every leaf, and every flower
Pearled with the self-same shower.
Thou shalt see the fieldmouse peep
Meagre from its celled sleep;
And the snake all winter-thin
Cast on sunny bank its skin;
Freckled nest-eggs thou shalt see
Hatching in the hawthorn-tree;
When the beehive casts its swarm;
Quiet on her mossy nest;
Then the hurry and alarm
When the beehive cast its swarm;
Acorns ripe down-pattering
While the autumn breezes sing.

O sweet Fancy! Let her loose;
Every thing is spoilt by use:
Where's the cheek that doth not fade,
Too much gazed at? Where's the maid
Whose lip mature is ever new?
Where's the eye, however blue,
Doth not weary? Where's the face
One would meet in every place?
Where's the voice, however soft,
One would hear so very oft?
At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth
Like to bubbles when rain pelteth.
Let, then, winged Fancy find
Thee a mistress to thy mind:
Dulcet-eyed as Ceres' daughter,
Ere the God of Torment taught her
How to frown and how to chide;
With a waist and with a side
White as Hebe's, when her zone
Slipt its golden clasp, and down
Fell her kirtle to her feet,
While she held the goblet sweet,
And Jove grew languid.—Break the mesh
Of the Fancy's silken leash:
Quickly break her prison-string,
And such joys as these she'll bring.—
Let the winged Fancy roam,
Pleasure never is at home.

—John Keats.

Earliest Spring.

Tossing his mane of snow in wildest eddies and tangles,
Lion-like March cometh in, hoarse, with tempestuous breath, Through all the moaning chimneys, and 'thwart all the hollows and angles
Round the shuddering house, threatening of winter and death.
But in my heart I feel the life of the wood and the meadow
Thrilling the pulses that own kindred with fibres that lift
Bud and blade to the sunward, within the inscrutable shadow,
Deep in the oak's chill core, under the gathering drift.
Nay, to earth's life in mine some prescience, or dream, or desire (How shall I name it aright?) comes for a moment and goes—
Rapture of life ineffable, perfect—as if in the brier, Leafless there by my door, trembled a sense of the rose.

THIS DECADENT AND CHAOTIC AGE.

Colonel Repington Snap-Shots Post-Bellum Europe.

"The war seems to have killed off all but the vulgarians" might be taken as the culminating philosophy of Colonel Repington's additional diaries. And his survey of topsy-turvy Europe in the year 1921 leads to the conclusion that the war has made vulgarians of the few extant who were not. It speaks rather well for humanity that the status quo of Western civilization turned them into nothing worse than vulgarians, if by the latter expressive term one means people who have lost, however temporarily, the accurate guidance of taste and reason. Europe—one still feels safe in rigid classification—is in the clutch of vulgarians—bolsheviks, reactionaries, revolutionists, counter-revolutionists, fanatical decadents of every sort, but all decadent, because that is the order of things in Europe.

It would be hard to say which part of the Continent demands immediate attention, so critical is the condition throughout. Czecho-Slovakia appears to be the danger zone, thanks to the unskillful partitioning of the peace. Germany, owing to its traditional obtuseness, is one of the least interesting. One's heart is wrung for France. Poor France! To think that the home of Western reason and its inevitable offspring, good taste, should now harbor willful stubbornness and irrationality. Writing in Greece, another state of extra precarious conditions, Colonel Repington notes:

French influence here has been practically destroyed by France's own faults during the war and after it. Opinion is quite unanimous on this point, and on the fact that English influence is supreme. France seems to have lost her political instinct as Gounaris declared, and maybe that the loss of her Russian ally has destroyed the basis of her Eastern policy.

This observation is the more remarkable as it was written months before the late Conference. To be sure, the opinion of Greece is a more or less volatile affair depending on the turn of royalist-revolutionary fortunes. Another recent traveler in Greece has reported the classic country as the enemy of practically every other European state. According to our diarist, however, Greece condescends to play favorites:

Maximos said that when Greeks spoke of the Allies, they now meant England who had the mastery of the world. France's influence was dead. Italy was not of much account. Greece wished to act with England, but without financial help in Asia Minor could not long continue to carry out the Allied policy. He agreed that Greece required fifty years to solidify her gains by the war, and I warned him of ambitious projects against Constantinople which would ruin everything.

Colonel Repington is naturally royalist in sympathy. He notes with approval that Constantine is really the national hero. After an interview with M. Robert de Billy, the French minister in Greece, he writes:

He thought that Venizelos' fall was due to his own failings. He had great ability, but was always in the clouds, had a board-school child's notions of finance, and let others carry on the internal policy while he was interesting himself in the big questions of foreign policy. Venizelos knew well that he would some day have to carry out a huge programme of internal reform after he had got his New Greece. The country was in a bad state administratively, and an immense work awaited the new government. Venizelos had carried on by his subordinates a system of tyranny which had proved his ruin. It could be excused during the war, but not after it. He admitted that the Greeks could smash the Turks, but did not see what the limit of their action could be. He did not much believe in the barrier of Turks against Bolshevism. . . . He knows too much of Greece, and says that the big people think that by saying that a thing is to be, it will be, whereas it will not be so in Greece. The psychology of the Greeks was very special. They ruled their government and were not ruled by it, as France and England were. The Greeks still regarded the world as made up of Greeks and Barbarians and thought it a condescension when they said that Greece was with this power or that. They were astounded when they found that this power was not with them. The Greeks were very subtle and trained to politics from infancy. They ate, drank, thought, and dreamed politics. When Rhalys came to apologize to Mme. Politis for having her windows broken, the lady said to her boy of six how nice it was for a prime minister to have taken such a step. "Pish! It was only a phrase," scoffed the infant.

This is an illuminating view of the Greek temperament, always one of the most baffling of the European, and considered Eastern by the remainder of the Continent. Perhaps because of their Oriental heritage, at any rate because of their merciless, businesslike method of reconstruction, the Greeks stand one of the best chances of coming out on top of the débâcle. From the outsider's viewpoint, it does not seem to matter much which party controls—so dominant is the Greek passion for government.

The direct antithesis of this state is to be found in Austria:

I don't think that people in Austria are thinking in political terms. The res angustia domi makes every one think of him or herself in economic terms. I am told that Austrians frequently say, well, anyhow we are by ourselves now, and need no more worry ourselves about what the Czechs, or Croats, or Magyars want. I am also told that the Entente ministers here have been constantly feeding the Austrians with hope of material support which never materializes, and that governments here have made their book on it.

This stupid materialism is what one would expect of a people who have never been allowed to learn to think. But conditions in Germany proper are even worse:

In general I found that the Bavarians frankly admit that they lost the war, and are not bothering much about the reasons why they lost it. The Eimwohnerwehr have given up their arms with reluctance, but admit that the vast extension of the movement was an error.

At least the Bavarians were honest than the Prussians. But Colonel Repington is more surprised than are we:

I never knew a people so changed as the Germans since the war. I think they are still dazed by their fall. They not only fell, they crashed. They can not get over it, understand it, or account for it. They are fearfully humiliated and very sad and sorry for themselves. They indubitably regard our view, that they began the war, as a fiction, and consider that the chief duty of German statesmanship must be to expose that fiction. They put down the original cause of the war to the encircling policy of England and avow that Russia mobilized first. So they regard the Versailles treaty as shameless brutality, and their clever if coarse caricaturists represent poor Michel—the German peasant—as a sort of saint, a harmless unarmed creature exposed daily to fresh bullying by the Allied powers. I doubt whether the men who fought in the war, and the older men who did not, will ever get over their experience of these years. Youth is more elastic, and it may be the German youth who may restore Germany to a high position. At present one hates talking to a German and a German hates talking to us.

In fact Germany is in pretty bad flavor in Europe. She may have forgiven herself for starting the conflagration, but her neighbors would forgive her more readily if she were not so self-righteous. Again poor France has to bear the burden of the odium:

In general the position of France at this moment is that Germany has shown flagrant bad faith by refusing to meet her obligations over reparations, by refusing to disarm her secret forces, and by neglecting to prosecute her war criminals. She demands the moral support of England in the measures of coercion which she is now compelled to begin, measures which will apply to the centre of the Imperialist and reactionary agitation. L. G. has publicly declared the German proposals to be "thoroughly unsatisfactory" and has agreed in principle to the Ruhr occupation. The Belgian press seems solid with France.

Naturally, Germany refuses to disarm her secret forces. All the straws point to a further and more emphatic expression of her righteous wrath. Colonel Repington had an interview with Captain Florange of the Inter-Allied Army of the Rhine on the subject of the hidden formations of the German army:

Each regiment of infantry is known, or believed, to possess three complete sets of arms, clothing, and equipment, and the seven divisions could become twenty-one on expansion, while the cavalry could become seven divisions.

It is necessary that the redundant arms and equipment should be given up. There are also more engineers than are allowed and the bridge-trains are enough for an army corps. The depots might similarly expand. The twenty-one divisions, if formed, might number 300,000 men, and it is probable that they would be completed as fast as the Reichswehr was made up when it went to put down the Ruhr revolt. This the French think to be only a covering force. The National Army is expected to group itself behind on the Schupo or Schützpolizei nucleus, which is the old dog in a new doublet, namely the old Sicherheitspolizei abolished by order of the Allies, but in fact handed over to the Ministry of the Interior and only renamed. It has 80,000 men in Prussia, and in all 150,000 men. It is considered to be the cadre of the future national army. How they will be formed is not precisely known, but the livrets or small books of 7,000,000 men are in existence and touch is kept with men through the pensions officer. There is also a system of passing men through the Schupo for nominally experimental training stages, which looks ominously like the old Prussian camouflage after 1806. Given the many rifles and machine guns known to exist, and the probability that many guns are also concealed, a good-sized body of troops could be formed, probably 1,500,000 it is thought, and the idea is that the triplicated Reichswehr would delay an enemy until this force was assembled in the interior. Such an idea has been formulated by a German general and is becoming a sort of doctrine.

Once again Colonel Repington gave the Teutonic character the benefit of the doubt:

I said, "Do you really believe that a people who have suffered so much want war again?" Florange said, No, the people did not, but the old Imperialist and reactionary parties wanted to reestablish a strong Germany and it was difficult to prevent them from doing so. This disastrous docility of the German people, and the hankering of all but Socialists for Monarchism, made many things possible. There was all this huge mass of officers out of work who longed for the reestablishment of their prerogatives, and these people naturally wished to act soon, as they could not afford to wait. If we could put off the possibility of a war for fifteen or twenty years, until this class and the trained soldiers were hors de cause, and the old military spirit had given way to the civil spirit, we might get over the danger of a fresh German aggression.

France may be temporarily hors de combat, but French opinion seems to have its usual rating. Colonel Repington explored it wherever he found it. M. André Lefèvre, late war minister in the governments of Millerand and Leygues, is the source of the following observations:

A striking character of whom we shall hear more if he lives. About the strongest man in Parliament here, not Jingo, but with a fixed idea that any measures are preferable to the resumption of war with Germany, which event he considers certain within five years unless we adopt drastic courses. He confirms Buat's estimate of the Boche preparations and puts their rifles down at four millions and their Maxims at many thousands. He also tells me that many essential parts of submarines are under construction, and I asked him to publish the information at once if it was authentic. He said that he would. He also believes that orders for arms are being executed in Sweden and elsewhere and that they are for the Germans eventually. His view is that directly the Commissions of Control are withdrawn, Germany will recommence to arm, and that it will not take her long to become the old Germany.

Lefèvre was as good as his word and printed in the Journal the details of Boche preparations for building submarines. This was in March, 1921, but the data seems to have cut little, if any, figure in the recent Conference.

More expert French opinion is elicited from Degoutte. General Degoutte was commander of the Inter-Allied Army of the Rhine:

Degoutte considered Upper Silesia to be still the great danger of the present moment and asked my opinion about it.

I said that I could find good grounds for all this in turn; for that of the Germans that all Upper Silesia should remain to them, because in a plebiscite they had polled 60 to 65 per cent. of the votes; for the Korfanty line, because I believed there was a tiny Polish majority east of this line; for Briand's desire to treat the whole mineral region as one, because the exploited and unexploited mineral region included both the triangle and the Pless-Rybnik Kreise; and lastly for the Anglo-Italian thesis, because the industrial triangle was really a region by itself, containing all the great agglomerations of people in Upper Silesia, where the Germans had a 50,000 majority.

A French journalist, M. Herbertte, who writes the leaders on foreign policy in Le Temps, contributed the following:

He thought, like Pétain, that we had made a bad peace, and regretted the break-up of Austria as I did. Czecho-Slovakia now stretched across to Europe and was like a cartridge of dynamite, hating everybody round them, but appearing to him more Slav and pro-Russian than anything else. Austria was bound to go to Germany some day, and Germany would then extend over Hungary next. He thought the new Serb State had more possibilities than any other carved out of the old Austria. We agreed to differ about the Greeks. He thought we were laying up great trouble for ourselves in future with Russia, owing to our backing of the Greeks and because of the little Baltic States which we had created. A revived Russia would sweep all this away.

One had almost forgotten Russia in view of Colonel Repington's revelations of other revolutionary states. As a matter of fact the diarist also ignores the great Slav experiment. Perhaps it would be useless to study so fluid a state. Perhaps it is reserved for a later volume.

Despite its bad name, Colonel Repington finds a good word for Czecho-Slovakia:

Now if we turn to the commercial and industrial side of the life here, it is certain that this little state is the most viable of all in this part of the world in its industrial present and future. It comprises about three-quarters of the riches of the former Austria, and though it is short by about 30 per cent. of the annual foodstuffs required, it has almost everything else needed for itself and much over for exportation. It is a good going business concern, but as it lives by its industries it competes with us, and owing to the high rate of exchange it can not buy our goods, while the control of the government over imports and the cheap production here make our merchants wary. There is scarcely any trade between Czecho-Slovakia and the countries at the top of the tree in the exchange scale. We might find a large field for banking here, but nothing is done, and the Germans are nearly sure to seize this outlet before long. . . . The Czechs rather play the Germans the game that the Germans formerly played them, and it is a dear price to be paid some day for the sake of paltry revenge. The aristocratic Germans sulk in their homes and wring their hands. They hate the Czechs, whom they have always considered an inferior race. They never even learned the Czech language, and now they refuse diplomatic appointments which Benes offers them and take little part in public life. These are in fact faults on both sides. Perhaps common interest will hold the two together for a time, but I do not see a recovered Germany failing to attract their Bohemian brother Germans now that the old German-Austria is in such low water, and the old empire is no more.

But it is unfair to the colonel's book to imply that all of it is lugubriously prophetic, though undoubtedly his attempt to face the European facts is the greatest merit of his excellent book:

A good Clemenceau story, if a trifle premature, at lunch today. Clemenceau reaches heaven and is taxed by St. Peter with not having confessed his sins. "But, holy saint," replied Clemenceau, "since I reached heaven I have been searching high and low for a priest and can not find a single one!" Another story of him after his operation for appendicitis. He was asked how he felt without it. "Quite well," replied the Tiger. "There are only two perfectly useless things in the world. One is an appendix and the other is Poincaré!"

And even the exigencies of post-war conditions afford an occasional smile:

Two good stories at dinner tonight. One, the receipt of a letter by the Hungarian government from the League of Nations requesting them to establish a sanitary cordon on the Polish frontier to prevent the spread of typhus. The fact that there is no such frontier is not yet known at Geneva. The other, an F.O. letter refusing to send petrol to Budapest, but saying that a lorry would be sent out via Trieste and that it could travel backwards and forwards from Budapest to Bucharest for supplies which, they believed, were available there. A rough calculation showed that the journey to Bucharest and back was one thousand miles or nearly as far as from Budapest to London. I wished that Henry Labouchere had been alive and in diplomacy here to answer that letter. He would have made the F.O. squirm.

It has been impossible in the limited space here to even suggest the numerous personalities that pass so vividly through the colonel's pages. Their discovery is a pleasure reserved for readers of the book. But just one sketch may be indulged in now:

Friday, April 29, 1921. Went off to see M. Clemenceau at his old address 8 Rue Franklin at 9 a. m. The same old commonplace bourgeois den, with the dark enclosed court all surrounded by other houses, and in the dining-room, where I waited for a few minutes, the same dirty old woodwork on the walls, crying for coats of paint, and the ordinary, almost lodging-house furniture, and the red carpet worn threadbare and in patches at the entrance. What a home for a man who has won the greatest war in history! Clemenceau came out of his room to find me. He was in the same old clothes and with a black half-turban cap on his head, and an almost imperceptible bit more stiff in his gait. But directly we sat down opposite one another at the well-known writing table. I saw that there was all the old fire, the alert brain, the rapid thought, the clear word, the penetrating sarcasm, in fact the old master who won the war and the tiger who destroyed so many ministries. I could not see a vestige of failure of his intellectual powers, and the eyes danced and glared and flashed, and the fun came rolling out with the same old humor, witicism, and profound knowledge of character and human nature.

As a portrait of one of the few who have not become vulgarians, the above is in striking contrast to the panorama unrolled by the colonel's trenchant pen.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending March 11, 1922, were $128,900,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $130,700,000; a decrease of $1,800,000.

Until the fundamental principles of investment are taught in our public schools many people will continue to gain their knowledge of such matters from their own sad experience, says John K. Barnes in Century Magazine. Books are printed which, if read carefully and the knowledge thus acquired applied to the investment of funds, would save many people from the loss of their savings; but, unfortunately, not many people read them. Meanwhile the interest in investments is growing and there was never a greater need for investment education. Therefore any rules which provide a short-cut to the results that investment education could be expected to bring are of value.

For years the law regulating savings bank investments in New York State has been a curity back of them and as to the record of earnings of the company issuing them. These make up the principal classes of securities in which New York savings banks can invest their funds. This list of so-called "legal" investments has been used for years as a guide to the selection of securities for those who wanted the safest investments they could get. Bonds in this savings bank list usually sell several points above others that are just as good but for some reason or other do not come in the list. As public utility bonds and industrial bonds have become better seasoned there have been opportunities for safe investment among them that would bring in a considerably higher interest; and there are also good possibilities for investment in railroad securities outside of those which are legal for savings banks to buy.

Andrew Carnegie, a great maker of wealth and also a great conservator of it, recognized this, and in his will he laid down certain rules for his trustees to follow in selecting securities for the investment of his fortune. These rules afford an excellent guide for those who do not wish to follow the more conservative New York savings bank law, but yet want conservative guidance in making their investments. They show that Carnegie's oft-quoted admonition to put all one's eggs in one basket and then watch that basket did not apply to investment, but to business ventures—a fact which is made clear by Carnegie himself in his autobiography. After he retired from the steel business, where he kept close watch of his eggs, he began to diversify his investments by the purchase of underlying main line railroad bonds. His investment rules left for his trustees permit them to invest in the following:

"1. In such securities as are sanctioned by the laws of the State of New York as proper investments for savings banks.

"2. In bonds secured by first mortgage on railroads in the United States upon the common stock of which dividends shall have been regularly paid for at least two successive years immediately preceding the time of such investment. (Under the New York savings bank law 4 per cent. dividends must have been paid for five years.)

"3. In any other class of bonds of any trunk railroad company in the United States in high credit, which has not failed to pay regular dividends on all its stock for at least five years immediately preceding such investment. (The savings bank law applies only to mortgage bonds.)

"4. In the preferred stock of any railroad company that meets the above requirements.

"5. In the bonds or preferred stock of any industrial corporation in the United States which shall not have failed to pay dividends on all its stock for at least five years immediately prior to such investment.

"6. In bonds secured by first mortgage on improved real estate in the United States worth, in the opinion of competent appraisers, a clear 50 per centum more than the amount of the mortgage. (This permits mortgages up to 66 2-3 per cent. of valuation.)

"7. In certificates of established bond and mortgage companies or trust companies secured by the deposit of specific bonds and mortgages answering the foregoing requirements."

Carnegie did not speculate himself and he left no provision for his trustees to do so. He early resolved to own no stock that was bought and sold upon any stock exchange. "Such a course," he says in his autobiography, "should commend itself to every man in the manufacturing business and to all professional men. For the manufacturing man especially the rule would seem all important. His mind must be kept calm and free if he is to decide wisely the problems which are continually coming before him. Nothing tells in the long run like good judgment, and no sound judgment can remain with the man whose mind is disturbed by the mercurial changes of the stock exchange. It places him under an influence akin to intoxication.

Merchants and manufacturers, in general, would have some grounds for a feeling of apprehension if the course of the markets and the current of events during the first few weeks of the present year were a sure index of the tendencies and conditions likely to prevail throughout the coming months; but there is no warrant or justification, fortunately, for any such conclusion. January is nothing but an arbitrary subdivision of the calendar which, of itself, determines nothing of the future, and the inconclusive character, generally, of developments within that period may be inferred from the fact that January is usually the dullest month, industrially, of the entire twelve. That alone—under existing circumstances—ought to be sufficient, by way of an explanation, to satisfy or reassure any one who has experience a feeling of disappointment or alarm over the somewhat inauspicious opening of 1922, says John Grant Dater in Harper's Magazine.

It is fairly typical of human nature that whatever is unfavorable in a situation appears doubly so at a time of extreme dullness. Given such a condition and various matters, financial, commercial, industrial, or political—some of them mere trifles—which at a time of abounding activity would scarcely be noticed, or would be ignored entirely, loom up as portentous happenings, or disturbing developments which seem to threaten the entire fabric of business and the stability of government. And, of course, the converse of the proposition is true, for when a buying craze seizes upon the community, as was the case in 1919, all warnings go unheeded, all caution is thrown to the winds and men plunge forward madly as though nothing could end the advancing movement. But we are not now dealing with that phase of this most curious and interesting problem of collective or market psychology.

That expectations regarding the enduring quality of the improvement noticed in certain departments of trade last autumn were pitched too high has long been apparent. In fact, it was clear to every observer as early as November that industry was again wavering or slipping back, and January was chiefly notable in emphasizing that feature and in demonstrating also that the recovery in business would be a slow and painful process. There was nothing unexpected or unusual about the recession, but, to the contrary, it is precisely what has been predicted of the markets ever since the similarity between the present reaction and the great depression that followed the panic of 1873 became recognized and appreciated. The recovery on that occasion was marked by an alternating series of rallies and recessions, and experienced economists and business men have expressed the opinion that business would travel the same road again. And it may be said that nothing which has developed in recent months has tended to modify this conclusion in any important particular.

There can be little if any doubt that as a result, chiefly, of seasonal dullness there has been a disposition upon the part of superficial observers to attach an undue importance to the fact that general business has shown no signs of a marked improvement and that the slight betterment which occurred in special lines of trade last year has not in every instance been maintained in full. In consequence, a depression of sentiment has settled down upon the markets as profound in some respects as that which prevailed up to August. Reports of financial and commercial difficulties, of the unsatisfactory condition of trade and the disturbing tendencies of legislation and of politics are attracting a great deal of attention and are figuring prominently in all business discussions. In fact the community appears to be talking of little or nothing else.

This is the season for the annual corporation reports, and the fact that many of those which have been coming to hand reflect simply appalling losses as a result of last year's business has added materially to the prevailpany, a deficit of $2,985,794, and the list might be expanded almost indefinitely.

Strassburger & Co. are offering $221,000 Corcoran Irrigation District, Kings County, California, serial gold 6 per cent. coupon bonds, at prices to yield 5 1/2 per cent. The income derived from these bonds is wholly exempt from Federal income taxes, including both the normal taxes, surtaxes, and excess profit taxes. Ownership certificates are not required when interest coupons are collected. Approved by the State Irrigation District Bond Commission, composed of the superintendent of banks, the state engineer, and the attorney-general, as a legal investment for California savings banks, commercial banks, trust companies, trust funds, insurance companies, state school funds, and all public funds which may be invested in state, county, city, or school district bonds; and as legally acceptable to secure deposits of state, county, and city funds in California banks. Assessed value of district for taxation purposes, $5,165,738.80.

E. G. Elliott & Co., Inc., are offering practically all of the available units of the Osage Royalty Company. The Osage Royalty Company is a common law trust company with an authorized capitalization of 1000 units, par value, $200 per unit. The company's holdings comprise leases of 920 acres in the Osage oil fields in Weston County, Wyoming. The Osage Royalty Company has leased to the Inland Oil and Refining Company 400 acres for $100,000 cash for the privilege of drilling the 400 acres. It is the Inland Oil and Refining Company's intention to drill 100 wells on this lease. One well started and paid for in full by the Osage Royalty Company—down 700 feet—will be completed in ninety days. Two more wells being drilled by the Inland Oil and Refining Company are to be completed in ninety days.

The Holland Land Company has advised Hunter, Dulin & Co., who underwrote their issue of $2,500,000 6 per cent. bonds, dated December 1, 1919, that up to February 28, 1922, $520,000 of these bonds had been redeemed and retired through the sinking fund. The Holland Land Company has just passed through an unusually successful year in spite of the conditions prevailing in all agricultural markets and in farming communities. Land sale contracts at the present time pledged with the trustees as further security for the bond issue total $3,891,557.65.

Henry L. Doherty & Co. and Cities Service Company, who own and control Empire Refineries, Inc., Crew Levick Company, and Empire Gas and Fuel Company with the large Mid-Continent production and holdings of the latter company, announce that they have entered into a working arrangement for a period of years with the Carson Petroleum Company which gives Cities Service Company interests first call on the export facilities of the Carson Petroleum Company.

The Carson Petroleum Company has just completed one of the most modern export plants in the world, located in the port of New Orleans. This terminal includes approximately 1,000,000 barrels of steel tankage with pipe-line and pumping equipment for loading tankers at a rate of approximately 2500 barrels per hour, together with complete casing, canning, and barreling facilities with a capacity for manufacturing, filling, and loading aboard ships approximately 10,000 cases and 1500 wood or steel barrels of petroleum products daily. The plant is equipped throughout with a complete modern conveying system for handling empty and filled packages from the point of manufacture and filling over the company's own docks into a ship's hold.

Hunter, Dulin & Co., who underwrote in 1915 $225,000 Consolidated Water Company of Pomona first mortgage 6 per cent. bonds, state that the company has had a successful year. Their operating revenue for the year 1921 amounted to $83,665.58. Operating expenses, including depreciation, amounted to $59,797.51. Bond interest amounted to $14,887.31. Net earnings were approximately one and one-half times bond interest. Income invested in betterments during the year 1921 amounted to $23,095.25.

To take care of greatly increased production demand the Crittall Casement Window Company has begun the erection of a new plant at Detroit, Michigan. The plant is being built by A. A. Albrecht, contractor, and will be ready for occupancy May 1st. The plans are the Crittall Casement Window ing condition of mind in financial and business circles. In the present temper of Wall Street it makes little or no difference that the statements and the losses bear upon past conditions and that the present situation and the outlook may be far better. The rank and file simply ignore that feature and dwell upon the losses and deficits, which seem to confirm their theory of an unimproved industrial position, and it is no doubt true that many months or years must elapse before some corporations are as strong financially as they were before the reaction set in. Some idea of what business was called upon to withstand last year may be inferred from the fact that the annual statement of Armour & Co. disclosed a deficit of $31,709,817; that of Sears-Roebuck & Co., a deficit, after charges, dividends, etc., of $19,094,127; that of the Consolidated Gas Company, a deficit of $9,979,537; that of the J. ## BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Now that the radio has become a fait accompli one begins to speculate what its ultimate effect on literature will be. Its influence on the art of letters may not be at first apparent, but a very immediate result can be foreseen with respect to newspapers; and journalism and literature are very closely allied. It is not hard to imagine a newspaperless era. The system used would be analogous to that employed by the African natives who have inter-village communication by means of drum beating. Of course not even the most fatuous member of the journalistic profession would hold that the fall of newspapers means a relapse to barbarism. But there is the analogy and it shows how revolving human progress is.

With newspapers gone, it is a short step to the abolition of all other periodicals, for most journals are of merely current interest and with our mind's eye we are now regarding a time when print will be reserved for the purposes of preservation only. People with a hobby for preserving files of newspapers will be a little out of luck and one will miss the light fuel that newspapers so readily lend themselves to, but otherwise, where would be the loss if all journals, daily and otherwise, could come, literally, in one ear and out the other?

Cultivated literature is not so easily managed. There will still be old-fashioned people with a hankering for books, per se. Again, the person with a love for books as things, regardless of what wisdom or folly they contain, will be out of luck. One feels for him, but has even keener sympathies for the playwright with a fondness for "the library" as a scene of setting. Indubitably, a radio receiving station has not the atmosphere of a library, the something rare and refined that a library full of dusty and probably germy books connotes. But one hopes for the sake of dramatist and novelist that libraries will not become extinct even though books do. Libraries, like speech, seem to be a human attribute, but we suspect that they will one day be composed of dictaphone records. There were libraries before the invention of print; they will probably survive the invention of the radio and dictaphone.

As for any effect the radio may have on current fiction and most contemporaneous non-fiction, one can not regret it whatever it will be. Of course, there are shining exceptions. There have been several notable books published within the last week. A book that is said to challenge comparison with the tremendous "Education of Henry Adams" is "Up Stream," an American chronicle, by Ludwig Lewisohn (Boni & Liveright). A book that bodes significance has just been put out by the Houghton Mifflin Company—"The Fall of Mary Stuart," by Frank A. Mumby. This remarkable volume is largely composed of Mary's correspondence and is a veritable source-book of history. Another Houghton Mifflin book of great charm is "American Portraits, 1875-1900," by Gamaliel Bradford. E. P. Dutton & Co., who have been going strong on books of an abstract nature of late—they are the publishers of the most important Einstein books, including the recent "Einstein the Searcher," by Alexander Moszkowski—have just issued two books of great philosophical importance. They are "Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion," by the Baron F. von Hügel, and "Our Unconscious Mind," by Frederick Pierce. These are all good books, some of them may be great books, but they and their kind are a small leaven in the great mass of print that would be better out of print. If the radio kills the latter—we are not quite sure how it will, but all the straws point that way—so much the better. Cheap fiction has to a large extent been supplanted by the movies, but it does not follow that the latter are a blessing in disguise. The trash is still there, only more of it. The lecture platform has superseded a certain type of didactic and reminiscence literature. The world of letters is certainly not the loser, and the lecture platform has the distinct virtue that one can stay away from it. Truly, the times could be worse. But the problem before us is the fate of letters. Our age has been called a mechanical one. It is said to contribute little toward culture, though much toward comfort. But Clio and Thalia and Calliope herself can not regret our scientific era if among other things we learn to suppress unnecessary books. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

The George H. Doran Company announces the publication of a novel by Arnold Bennett. "Mr. Prohack" is Mr. Bennett's first since the advent of "The Pretty Lady" (Doran), published in 1918. This last novel is said to be a delightful treatment of a new rich man endeavoring to "take things easy" scientifically and expensively.

A further installment of Queen Victoria's letters, edited by Mr. G. E. Buckle, will be published in 1924.

Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson's next novel, "This Freedom," is to be published in England in the autumn.

H. G. Wells' novels, "The Passionate Friends" and "The Country of the Blind," have been recently filmed.

Among the forthcoming publications of the J. B. Lippincott Company is a novel by Dr. Burris Jenkins, entitled "The Bracegirdle." This is a romance of London in the days of King William of Orange, the story of a charming and talented actress, Anne Bracegirdle, who was one of the famous characters of the London stage in the seventeenth century. Dr. Jenkins will be remembered as the author of "Princess Salome: A Tale of the Days of Camel-Bells."

Professor J. Arthur Thomson, editor of the colossal new four-volume work, "The Outline of Science," the first volume of which is to be published this spring by G. P. Putnam's Sons, holds the chair of natural history at Aberdeen University.

Romance and Stevenson are not dead, if we may judge from the experience of the publishers of the new Vailima Edition of the author. Not many weeks ago it was announced that Charles Scribner's Sons, in co-operation with the five publishers in England of the works of Stevenson, were preparing a comprehensive edition in twenty-six volumes, to appear at intervals during the present year. Before a volume actually appeared in England, the supply of one thousand sets for Great Britain was exhausted and the Vailima was held at a premium. Something of the popularity of the work of Stevenson in America may be inferred from the statement just sent out by the publishers in this country that the American supply of one thousand sets has been sold, although only four of the twenty-six volumes have actually appeared, and that the price of the edition has been advanced. This is even more significant than the experience in England, as each American set has actually been sold to an individual customer.

Mr. Stanley Rinehart, son of Mary Roberts Rinehart, is the partner of Mr. Doran, the publisher, whose daughter he married. Though but just over forty, Mrs. Rinehart is a grandmother.

Sir James Frazer, author of "The Golden Bough," has been further immortalized by M. Antoine Bourdelle, the great French sculptor, who has just completed a bust of the English folk-lore.

S. B. H. Hurst, whose "Coomer Ali" has been recently published by Harper & Brothers, has from the age of sixteen sailed cargoes to Japan, China, India, and Java. He has taken pilgrims to Mecca and convicts to Andaman. Harpers have signed him up for a series of novels.

Ancient Greece's fourth great art was that of vase-painting, and although an extensive literature in the shape of monographs has grown up about it, due to the important discoveries resulting from recent excavations in Greece and Italy, a full history of the subject has been wanting. A volume just published by E. P. Dutton & Co., "Greek Vase-Painting," is a very careful and important work, giving a history of Greek vases in all their periods, which affords for all students of classical art the history and study, at once comprehensive and detailed, which they have long needed. It is by the German authority,

Dr. Ernst Buschor, has been translated by G. C. Richards of Oriel College, Oxford, and has a preface by Percy Gardner, professor of classical archaeology in the University of Oxford. It is beautifully illustrated with one hundred and sixty examples of vase painting reproduced in half-tone engraving on special paper.

There is to be a new edition of John Henry Shorthouse's "John Inglesant," a novel that made a great stir in its day. Even then, when the novel was not the universal reading that it is now, "John Inglesant" had a great vogue, for it raised vital religious and ecclesiastical questions when interests in those subjects ran high in England. Incidentally, it was much canvassed by Gladstone and other notables.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Hands of Nara.

Just as a few years ago all the world was dance mad, now every one has become a devotee of the psychic. The two are symptoms of the same unrest. Hard physical exercise is one way of "getting out of oneself"—the slogan that becomes a fetish with the characters of "The Hands of Nara"—and psychic hypnotism is another way. The dramatis personae of Mr. Child's new novel choose the latter.

It is not quite clear whether Mr. Child is rejecting or advocating the measure. Perhaps he is just stating the case. As an argument his book cancels itself in several respects. But as a picture of contemporary society it is faithful. Vanessa Yates discovers after a more or less hectic career of pleasure-seeking that self-sacrifice is the true recipe for self-escape, but Vanessa chooses another escape. After all, that is what most of us do. Few have the courage of their consciences. Nara Alexieff believes in magic and miracles, but lives to repudiate her own powers. Evidently in obedience to the law of compensation Emlen Claveloux, our hero-physician, and worshipper at the altar of truth, swerves round to see the virtues of the spirit. A fair exchange. And though it leaves one in considerable doubt as to the writer's actual convictions, it makes for verisimilitude. It is rather a relief to find a thoughtful novel that is not the exposition of a private belief.

As a story "The Hands of Nara" has considerable dramatic interest. It is one more of the many novels that have borrowed their local coloring from the juxtaposition of nationalities that is one of the aftermaths of the war.

THE HANDS OF NARA. By Richard Washburn Child. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.; $2.

A History of California.

A popular history by an authoritative historian is an admirable conjunction. Many so-called histories are written in a popular vein that merely add to the sum of misinformation of the public. On the other hand, the professional historian is usually uninterested in popular dissemination of knowledge. Dr.

Chapman is therefore rendering a rather unusual service in his "History of California," which is as authoritative as thirteen years of intensive preparation and the author's immense historical experience can make it.

The present volume, sub-titled "The Spanish Period," takes the story of California from its known beginnings up to 1847. It is the narrative of one of the most romantic chapters of history, perhaps only equaled in the New World by the French conquest of the lower Mississippi. Even that phase of American development is hardly as epic, or as significant in its later bearings on our country. But though the period covered is that of the Spanish possession, the rôle of the Spaniard is given in its proper perspective. Russian and English foreign relations, internal Indian affairs, and the American element all play their part in Dr. Chapman's perspective. "A History of California" is a noteworthy volume.

Wayfarers in Arcady.

Readers of Mr. Vince's "The Street of Faces" and "England in France" will be interested to see a new collection of his essays in print. "Wayfarers in Arcady," is more of a nature study than either of his two previous books, and in that respect will appeal to a slightly different public. But every one who reads essays must be interested in his work and every one with a discriminating taste for English prose built with the architectural surety of Hillaire Belloc's will read his writings for the unusual gratification that they afford.

"Wayfarers in Arcady" is reminiscent of Hillaire Belloc's outdoor books in yet another way. It deals largely with roads and road pilgrims, with hills and downs. Not that Mr. Vince is an imitator. His talent is too sincere to plagiarize. It is simply that he belongs to a small class of writers who find their inspiration in wayfaring—a form of literature that seems to be particularly conducive to a progressive style and a logical course of writing.

Charles Vince is an English journalist who fought with the Royal Sussex Regiment during the war, until in 1917 he was appointed to the staff, serving in the Military Intelligence Directorate.

The Life of the Weevil.

Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, the translator of so much of the best of French literature into English, and particularly of the works of Henri Fabre, has gathered into the present book the essays on weevils contained in the "Souvenirs Entomologiques." Some of these essays have already appeared in English in "The Life and Love of the Insect" and "Social Life of the Insect World," but the greater part is fresh material. The book is doubly interesting inasmuch as it is probably the last of Mr. de Mattos' admirable translations.

Seeds of Time.

A new volume of verse by John Drinkwater is "Seeds of Time," a number of short poems, many of which have appeared in periodicals, and are now gathered together for the first time. The selection has been carefully made to suit the plaintif motif of the title and these verses are characteristic of Mr. Drinkwater's graceful muse.

SEEDS OF TIME. By John Drinkwater. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $1.25.

One Man's View.

Another volume of the limited edition of Leonard Merrick's works has just been published—"One Man's View." Readers of Mr. Merrick are familiar with this romance and with its difference from the more typical Merrick tales of Tricotrin and Conrad. "One Man's View" is reminiscent of the better Barrie novels, but has a distinct genre of its own. Exquisitely written and gently dealing with human weakness, it is yet one of the sincerest of modern novels. We hesitate to apply the word realistic, so miserably have its uses been deflected, but "One Man's View" is realistic in the sense that its plot is plausible and its characters react in a natural way. A repudiation of "One Man's View" leads one to the gloomy conclusion that they wrote better novels in the 'nineties.

L'Action Nationale publishes a letter from Mayence in which its correspondent says:

"All the German will is strained toward the most rapid preparation for the war of revenge. It is sufficient to observe seriously and attentively the industry of the Reich.

"In seven months of this year thirteen factories of Westphalia, West Prussia, and Bavaria have produced 2748 agricultural tractors of the small German type of 1918. These tractors, which are too heavy for agricultural purposes, are intended for war, for in twenty minutes they can be transformed into tanks. Protecting plates and screens are constructed and are always in proximity to the place where the pacific 'tractor' draws the agricultural machine."

MAITLAND LEAVES US. AVE ATQUE VALE.

Arthur Maitland has arrived. A movement, headed by the mayor of Portland, Maine, and backed by all the musical, literary, and dramatic societies of that city, has been initiated, as a result of which Mr. Maitland has accepted an offer to continue in Portland the work he has been doing in San Francisco.

Two hundred and fifty subscribers will give the director financial backing, and a fine modern theatre that will hold two hundred and fifty people is in process of being built.

No doubt Mr. Maitland could give a year or two turn about to various of the leading cities of the country, and do well. But Portland evidently wants him and his work for a lengthy period. At any rate, the theatre is leased for a term of ten years. And, as an earnest of the feeling of satisfaction over the affair, a committee of citizens headed by the mayor will meet Director Maitland the day he arrives in Portland and tender him a public reception and banquet.

Director Maitland has another reason for feeling that recognition of his work is in the air. A prominent citizen of New Orleans, who was visiting San Francisco, saw two performances of the Maitland Players, one of them being Shaw's "Getting Married." The visiting New Orleanist, when he went home, got busy, as a result of which he got a $40,000 guarantee from his fellow-citizens for a thirty weeks' season by Maitland and his company in New Orleans. Mr. Maitland, being otherwise engaged, could not accept it, but he must feel quite jubilant to have a double crown of laurel on his brow.

In the meantime San Francisco theatre-goers will miss the Maitland Theatre and the splendid line of plays with which we have gratefully made acquaintance through the young director's untiring work. We wish him every success, realizing with mingled regret and congratulation that our loss is Portland's gain.

The rueful patrons of the Maitland Theatre, thus bereft, have but two more weeks, counting the present, in which to enjoy the performances of the Maitland Players. "The Duke of Killcrankie," the bill for this week, will be remembered by confirmed theatre-goers as a popular vehicle for John Drew. It is one of the agreeable comedies written by Captain Marshall, all of whose pieces had a light, graceful touch, pleasant humor, and an ingratiating social atmosphere.

Here in San Francisco we saw Lawrence d'Orsay in the part, the tall, hee-haw Englishman with the accent and the eye-glass, who during his heyday enjoyed considerable popularity in the English rôles that particularly suited him.

The play, naturally, has a few reminders—the absence of the telephone and the motor—that it is not strictly up to date. But it fits in well with the happy mood of Director Maitland, who makes a most agreeable figure as the ingenious duke, playing the rôle of a modern Lochinvar.

Lea Penman, who accompanies the Maitland group to Portland, where she will remain as a member of the company, and Dorothy Wetmore, whom experience in the Maitland line of plays is appreciably developing, were attractive in the rôles of the two reluctant young women that were kidnapped and immured in Killcrankie Castle by the two enterprising suitors. Nance Wienusky gave the correct worldly tone to the rôle of an aristocratic dowager, and Sydney Riggs, who has been useful in twice filling prominent rôles, showed that he had made great strides.

"The Climax," by Locke—William Locke, I suppose—is the appropriate title for the final bill, after which the Maitlanders make their exit in a brilliant aura of recognition and success.

And now remains to be seen whether another manager will profit by entering the field so soon to be vacated by Mr. Maitland. We are assured that quantities of good, experienced New York players are in their favorite metropolis officiating, in order to earn a living, in rather menial positions. It would be a good time for the manager who wants to live and work under quieter conditions than in hectic New York to jump over here with a stock company and try it on us in San Francisco.

W. L. GEORGE'S FINAL LECTURE.

On Wednesday evening W. L. George, under the auspices of Paul Elder, offered a very interesting interpretation of several of the satirical works of that greatest of satirists, Anatole France. The lecturer mentioned at once Anatole France's disbelief in Christian dogma, and his tolerant conviction that man is a very poor thing. And we can but recognize immediately that this detachment enables Anatole France to take an unbiased view of life and the queer doings of mankind. How queer he considers them we may deduce from such of his statements as this: that mankind wants myths, and, in the absence of any, creates them. Hence when Greek mythology went, man evolved the Christian myth to take its place.

How sovereign is this great thinker's contempt for humankind may also be gathered from his "Penguin Island," that great and mordant satire, in which the foolish birds are typical of man. In this the satirist shows how ridiculous, in his estimation, are man's conventions and moral and political institutions. Possibly there never was a work in which a satirist so neatly and contemptuously made man and life's sophistries a punctured bladder reduced to shapelessness on the end of a thrusting pen.

Anatole France's symbolic treatment of foolish mankind turns up again in the Bergeret books, in which Mr. George pointed out that Bergeret, the man—who is plainly France himself—is the Godhead of his dog, Ricquet, while Ricquet is man in the attitude of worship.

Such profound, deeply-rooted cynicism as is expressed in the France literature is, to the receptive conventionalist in thought, immensely disintegrating. For while France allows himself emotions to the extent of being a patriot—as he proved during the war—and at once scorns, loves, and pities mankind, his whole theory of life, as the lecturer pointed out, is that pleasure is the only useful thing in it. Which recalls the horrors depicted in the lives of the self-flagellating monks in France's "Thais," in which was embodied his reprobation of the asceticisms and religious fanaticism practiced in the early Christian era, when hapless man hit upon his fantastic theory of the virtue of celibacy.

Mr. George, as we may gather from his books, is a good deal of a cynic himself, but he disagrees with Anatole France's conclusion that men always remain the same. He greatly admires him as a thinker, nevertheless neatly analyzes his character, which he states to be that of a man of both reason and instinct, the one warring against the other, but he considers that he fails as a novelist to live up to his high intellectual estate, his novels being incoherent and full of digressions.

Evidently Mr. George has discovered that our American culture is superficial and incomplete. At any rate he gave us liberal examples of Anatole France's satires, with illuminating comments; which is an excellent idea, since France's literary output is so copious that only an interpreter, such as Mr. George himself, would be apt to be familiar with it all. Added to which we were not at all unwilling to have our memory of what we had once read refreshed, and our comprehension enlarged.

TRANSLATING "DECLASSEE."

All the world and his wife are going to see Ethel Barrymore in "Déclassée." And when they come away everybody asks everybody else what Ethel Barrymore was getting at in that long speech just following her entrance about "wawa," or "baba," or "vava." As an act of pure Christian consideration I am copying the speech from the February, 1920, number of Current Opinion, in which there is a summary of the play, and some very liberal excerpts therefrom. And I would be willing to make a bet that there will be a run on that number in the library from those baffled persons who like the Zoë Akin play and love Ethel Barrymore, but who didn't get the Varvick speech and other speeches:

Lady Helen (with a laugh)—"The mad Varvicks will soon trouble the world no longer. I suppose you don't know about the mad Varvicks? There was once quite a lot of us, and now I'm the only one left. We were very gay about five hundred years ago, but even then we were a little mad, too, I suppose. And we kept on being gay and mad through some of the soberest days that England has ever known. Sometimes we lost our heads; sometimes we went to house parties in the Tower; sometimes we hunted with the king and knew all the secrets of the queen. But there never was a battle fought for England, by land or sea, in which some Varvick did not offer his gay, mad life. Perhaps that's how we got the habit of dying. We've always died. I think we've rather liked dying—just as we've always liked our ghosts and our debts and our hereditary goat and our scandals and our troubadours and our fortune-telling gipsies and even our white sheep. We do admit to an occasional white sheep in the family—one every century or so."

POWYS ON PROUST.

The series of bulky novels by Marcel Proust, which follow each other in a sequential line and enable the diligent reader to meet the same people over and over again, has attracted considerable attention both in and out of France. The Proust novels are not easy reading. One must be in the grip of a real enthusiasm to master something like twenty volumes; for the six are divided up by this writer, who so reluctantly lays down his pen, into volumes within volumes.

Professor Powys seems to have attained to that state of enthusiasm, and discoursed most interestingly last Friday morning on the matter and manner of the Proust novel, which he declares to be the finest that have come out in twenty years.

The two great merits of the series are pronounced by Professor Powys to be an inspired and absolutely faithful picture of the blue-blooded aristocracy of Europe—the Europe of several decades ago—and an exquisitely profound perception of that lonely ego within us that reacts in its own solitude to the panorama of life. And there were other points he mentioned with immense admiration: the perfect taste displayed by the author in his revelation of the aristocrat at ease with his own kind; and the æsthetic delight with which the author surveys every aspect, including the dullest, of life.

The lecturer mentioned Rolland's "Jean Christophe," only to compare that lengthy series to Proust's, to its own disadvantage. Nor can Thackeray or Meredith, declared Mr. Powys with holy enthusiasm, compare, in their pictures of English patricians, with Marcel Proust, who is to fiction what Van Dyke was to painting: an aristocrat depicting aristocrats with the art of a master.

No doubt Mr. Powys' audience, fired by his eloquence, went home resolved to plunge into this new and fascinating sea of fiction. But a lot of them are going to fall by the wayside. The mere aspect of a Proust novel is terrifying, for the pages are alarmingly compact looking, the dialogue comparatively infrequent, the style discursive, and the sentences of unwieldy length. I counted one that contained 170 words. An appreciator of Marcel Proust would smile disdainfully at that comment, but when you get a book full of sentences of that length, many of them containing parentheses three or four lines long, it gives to novel-reading the appearance of hard work.

I am not speaking from the point of view of an English-speaking person reading French, for, being alarmed at the general aspect of "A L'Ombre des Jeunes Filles en Fleur," which I had by me, I sprang it on some inoffensive French friends. They toiled through it, partly because they felt the intellectual finesse of the author, but nevertheless they intend in future to cut his acquaintance. One of the comments, made by a French intellectualist who has passed his life in the study of French literature, is that undoubtedly there are nuggets of gold in the Proust novels, but that there is too much dull drudgery necessary to dig them out.

For Marcel Proust has the habit of indulging in lengthy reflections on life, human nature, the passing show. They contain truth, undoubtedly, but, as with the person who unconsciously thinks aloud, they include many slight, fugitive ideas that are not worthy of preservation in print; in such quantity, at any rate.

There is truth in what he says, but his reflections are too piffling, too essentially uninteresting to block the main current of the novel. Besides, Proust has a way of getting away from his subject. He is frightfully discursive, and when he gets to reflecting he sends out so many divergent shoots that if his printed meditations were diagrammed they would look as errant as the rills running away in meandering streams from an overturned tub of water.

The Columbia Theatre.

Ethel Barrymore is playing to packed houses at the Columbia Theatre in Zoë Akins' unusual play, "Déclassée." As Lady Helen Haden, the heroine of Miss Akins' story, Miss Barrymore has a rôle of the kind in which her following likes to see her best. But one more week remains of her present engagement at the Columbia Theatre, the farewell San Francisco performance having been definitely announced to take place Saturday evening, March 25th. Seats for all remaining performances were placed on sale Thursday morning, March 16th, and the demand has been very heavy.

The Orpheum.

And now it is Mrs. Sidney Drew who is embarking upon a vaudeville cruise. Mrs. Drew has "captained" many an amusement ship in the movies, the drama, and now the two-a-day. Her career on the screen is too well known to require comment. When Mrs. Drew deserted the movies for the legitimate stage it was as a star and, of course, she comes to vaudeville as an undisputed headliner. Here she is offering a playlet by Edwin Burke called "Predestination." "Predestination" gives a new angle to the triangle. It is described as a domestic comedy.

Being a laughing stock is a decided asset if you happen to be the laughing stock of vaudeville. Ray and Emma Dean say they are this, and their antics prove their claim. Ray assumes the character of a "wise hick." Emma sings well and does straight for Ray's clowning.

Pinto and Boyle present "The Mysterious Musical Trunk." This sounds as though they were prestidigitators or illusionists. They are nothing of the sort, but they are comedians and musicians. They offer an Italian comedy act of talk, song, and music on novel instruments.

The world's art is necessarily confined to a few art galleries divided among many nations. The public is familiar with the great sculptures by copies of photographs. Weston's Models afford a much better opportunity to see these treasures. They produce with living models the masterpieces from famous galleries.

Raymond Wilbert is described as "the Unusual Fellow," and the description is constantly appropriate because Wilbert is at the same time exceptional, uncommon, singular, and extraordinary. He offers a specialty that is unique and original.

Lois Bennett, who hails from this Coast, has done principally concert work and light opera. In vaudeville her splendid voice is heard in a series of musical melodies, the songs that do more than please.

Miss Ruby Norton in a new repertoire of songs and Hal Skelley and his excellent company in "The Mutual Man" will remain for a second week.

Farewell to the Maitland.

After five years in San Francisco, Arthur Maitland will close the doors of the Maitland Playhouse for the last time after this week's performance of Edward J. Locke's serio-comedy, "The Climax." Director Maitland is leaving for the East the first of April, having accepted an offer from Portland, Maine, where he will open a theatre about the first of July.

Arthur Maitland opened the "little theatre" venture at the Hotel St. Francis, and three seasons ago with his own company started the Maitland Playhouse, on Stockton Street above Post.

For this week the John Drew success, "The Duke of Killcrankie," is being played most successfully by the Maitland company.

The Mikado.

Those who heard the Dunbar Opera Company in the recent production of "Robin Hood" will appreciate the singing quality of the cast promised for the forthcoming revival of Gilbert and Sullivan's gem of comic operas, "The Mikado." The light opera organization is returning to the Columbia Theatre on Sunday night, March 26th, with three elaborate revivals, "The Mikado," "The Bohemian Girl," and "Pinafore." There is so much of charm, so much of wit, and so much of delightful music to "The Mikado" that a complete light opera company will be able to shine in its rendition.

The cast of "The Mikado" will be as follows: Edward Andrews as Koko, Harry Pfeil as Nankipoo, Carl Bundschu as Poo Bah, George Olson as the Mikado, Edward Thomas as Pish Tush, Theo Pennington and Nellie Andrews alternating in the rôle of Yum Yum, Paula Ayres as Katisha, June Reed as Pitti Sing.

San Francisco Opera Season.

Because of its spectacular nature, Verdi's "Aida" has been selected for the opening of the Chicago Grand Opera Company's second San Francisco season on Monday evening, March 27th. On that night Rosa Raisa will be welcomed once more to San Francisco in the title-rôle. Edward Johnson will sing the rôle of the Egyptian warrior, Rhadames. The contralto rôle of Amneris will be taken by the American contralto Cyrena Van Gordon, and Giacomo Rimini will be heard as the Ethiopian king, Amonasro. The Pauley Oukrainy Ballet, a large chorus, and a stage band of forty are features of the production.

On Tuesday evening Director-General Mary Garden will make her first appearance of the engagement as Fiora in Montemezzi's picturesque opera, "The Love of Three Kings." With her will be heard Lucien Muratore, who is singing with his former vigor and charm after his recovery from a recent operation. The cast will include Georges Baklanoff and Virgilio Lazzari, with Giorgio Polacco, the principal conductor of the organization, at the director's stand.

Josef Schwarz, who made his American debut here last season in "Rigoletto," will sing the rôle of the Jester once more on Wednesday evening. Edith Mason will sing the rôle of Gilda and will doubtless repeat the triumph which she has scored in this opera in Chicago and New York this season.

For Thursday evening "Tannhäuser" is scheduled with a cast including Rosa Raisa, Cyrena Van Gordon, Riccardo Martin, and Josef Schwarz. On Friday evening Mary Garden will make her second appearance in the title-rôle of "The Juggler of Notre Dame," supported by Hector Dufranne and Virgilio Lazzari. Edith Mason, Lucien Muratore, and Georges Baklanoff will take the principal rôles in "Romeo and Juliet" at the Saturday matinée, and for Saturday evening "The Jewels of the Madonna" is promised with Rosa Raisa as Mariella.

The second week of the engagement will open on Monday evening, April 3d, with Charpentier's "Louise." Mary Garden, as actress, will sing the title-rôle, and as director-general will introduce to the West Ulysses Lappas, the Greek, tenor, who will be heard as Julien.

Edith Mason will sing the title-rôle in Puccini's Madame Butterfly" on Tuesday evening, with Irene Pavloska as Suzuki, Edward Johnson as Pinkerton, and Giacomo Rimini as Sharpless. Bellini's "Norma," an opera that demands a dramatic soprano of exceptional power, will be revived on Wednesday evening as a vehicle for the artistry of Rosa Raisa.

A high light of the season will be the production of Richard Strauss' "Salomé" on Thursday evening. This work, which has not been seen here for ten years, will afford music lovers an opportunity to see Miss Garden in her most widely discussed rôle, in which she appeared more than one hundred times in Paris.

"La Bohème" is the bill for Friday evening, with Edith Mason as Mimi and Edward Johnson as Rodolfo. Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West," which has not been seen here since Henry Savage presented it in 1912, will be given for the final Saturday matinée. Rosa Raisa will take the part of Minnie, Ulysses Lappas will be the dashing bandit, Dick Johnson, and Giacomo Rimini will sing the part of the Sheriff. The engagement will close on Saturday evening with "Monna Vanna," with Mary Garden, Lucien Muratore, and Georges Baklanoff in the cast.

Godowsky.

Leopold Godowsky, the pianist, will appear in recital next Tuesday night, March 21st, at 8:30 o'clock, and next Sunday afternoon, March 26th, at 2:30 o'clock, in the Scottish Rite Auditorium, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy. Godowsky's interpretations of the old and tried compositions from the masters, as well as new works by modern writers, is recognized the world over as authoritative.

Kreisler.

Fritz Kreisler will give a recital on Easter Sunday afternoon, April 16th, at the Exposition Auditorium, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy. At all Kreisler's recitals Carl Lamson coöperates as accompanist.

The Sequoia Little Theatre has a change of programme this month. Four one-act plays have pleased its clientèle, one of them by Mr. Gay Lombard, a member of the Bohemian Club. August Strindberg's "The Stronger" also appears on the programme.

The Powys Lectures.

In response to requests, John Cowper Powys will give three additional morning lectures at the Maitland Theatre on "Great Personalities." "Anatole France" will be the subject this Friday morning. Sunday night, also at the Maitland Theatre, Powys will talk on "Where the World Is Tending," expressing whether in his opinion evolution or degeneration best applies to this subject. "Lloyd George" and "Oscar Wilde" are the topics of next week's morning lectures. Following his engagements here, which extend until the last of March, Powys will go on tour of Southern California.

Mero-Fanning Joint Recital.

At the next number of the Alice Seckels' Matinée Musicales Selby G. Oppenheimer will present Yolanda Mero, the Hungarian pianist, and Cecil Fanning, the American baritone, in joint recital. In this recital Mme. Mero's share of the programme will include an interesting Chopin group and works by Brahms, Rachmaninoff, Debussy, and the Second Liszt Rhapsody. The concert will take place in the Colonial Ballroom of the St. Francis Hotel, Monday afternoon, March 20th.

H. A. Franck at the Elder Gallery

Harry A. Franck will speak in the Paul Elder Gallery, Wednesday afternoon, March 22d, at 2:30 o'clock, on "A Vagabond Journey Through the Orient," and again Thursday evening, March 23d, in the Scottish Rite Auditorium, on "Oriental South America," describing the Argentine, Uruguay, Brazil, the British, French, and Dutch Guineas and Venezuela. On each occasion slides from his own photographs will be shown.

The reissue of "Daniel Boone and the Wilderness Road," by H. Addington Bruce, with its vivid picture of pioneer life and social conditions west of the Appalachians in the eighteenth century, recalls the contemporary description of Boone, written by the great naturalist Audubon, who passed a night with him in a West Virginia cabin: "The stature and general appearance of this wanderer of the Western forests approached the gigantic. His chest was broad and prominent; his muscular powers displayed themselves in every limb; his countenance gave indication of his great courage, enterprise, and perseverance; and when he spoke, the very motion of his lips brought the impression that whatever he uttered could not be otherwise than strictly true."

Shriners' Excursion.

Negotiations will soon be completed, it is stated by Mr. Albert Rebel, president of the Pacific Atlantic Travel Bureau, Inc., to charter the British steamship King Alexander, formerly the German liner Cleveland, for an excursion of sixty days from New York to San Francisco and Honolulu. A party numbering 1200 will leave New York the 24th of May and will arrive here in time for the Shriners' Convention. Then the steamer will leave for Honolulu, where she will stop five days, to return after that to New York with a stop-over at Havana. Mr. T. S. Edwards of this city, vice-president of the corporation, is now in New York looking after the arrangements. According to reports from the East, the excursion plan has received a tremendous endorsement and the steamship will probably be booked to capacity. Even many San Francisco Shriners are going East to make the return trip with the King Alexander.

In Japan during the past year there died the famous "Karasake no Matsu," or sacred pine, popularly believed to be 1200 years old and celebrated for centuries in songs and legends. The tree is of unusual form. Though only thirty feet in height, its branches cover a span of 163 feet from east to west and 154 feet from north to south.

bosses. That was disgraceful, and in addition it was silly, because they did not have to endure it. They were at the mercy of the shifting interests of parties. Why stand that? The women wouldn't. Cliques and factions controlled them. They must be feeble-minded, or at least they were lacking in any proper measure of manliness and pride. Great, helpless simpletons, they indulged in remonstrances and then in braggadocio, when the remonstrances were of no avail and the braggadocio had no basis. Woman had endured them, searched them, sounded them, and found them hollow and well-nigh valueless. Their public morals were uncertain, or else, alas, too certain, and their politics were as corrupt as in their most nearly sane and rebellious hours they represented them to be. In a public and social sense there was no good in them, no reliance to be placed upon them. Like the degenerate Persians, "their acts were as the water and their words were like the wind." The hideous spoils system stood as an evil monument to the incapacity, the neglect, the natural insufficiency and general failure of masculine politics. For centuries men had been tried, and this was the pitiful result. They were about good enough and skillful enough to discharge some routine task each day and bring home the bacon or the pork chops or the standing roast at night, if they didn't forget it, but heaven knew they frequently did forget it, and they hadn't another thing in the world to think about. No wonder everything was in a mess. Men made it so. They complained of public frauds and abuses daily for two years at a time, and then they went to the polls and voted the straight party ticket, and the corruption of all things political, financial, and social went right on, and why not? Let the women vote. Let the competent sex, the moral sex, the conserving, steady, home-keeping sex with its deep experience of the requirements of life—let that sex take hold of politics, and politics would become several shades cleaner than a hound's tooth and whiter than the driven snow, whoever may have driven it. There would be no more bosses. There would be no blind following of party. There would be no more immoral trading. Rings and political trusts would hide their diminished heads, while the purest and most unselfish patriotism would mount the seats of power and begin the dispensation of that heretofore futile desire of the human heart, impartial justice, under the ægis of a cleansed and renovated bisexual citizenship.

Well, it was done, in California and throughout the nation. Woman was endowed with the purifying power of the ballot. And now that everything has been thereby reformed and all the crooked things have been made straight, and there is no more trading, and no more abuse of spoils, and no partisan use of patronage, let us see how it has worked, and just what are the outlines of the new millennium. According to a keen political observer and writer of the local daily press, Mrs. Gladys Magill, Democratic national committeewoman, made efforts to have the State League of Iroquois Clubs write the Democratic National Congressional Committee and commend it for appointing the aforesaid Mrs. Gladys Magill. This precipitated an acrid sort of debate at the recent league convention between the faction of Mrs. Magill and another supporting Mrs. Nellie Donohoe, Democratic national committeewoman, the latter faction holding that their chieftainess (one hesitates to use the word boss) because of her place in the party organization "holds the high powers of the Democratic party among the women of the state, while Mrs. Magill's friends say that she will be the big factor among the Democratic women, especially as she will have the patronage." Since all the purification and rejuvenation and moral uplift have come true according to promise (and who, having heard those promises and predictions can doubt it now?), we are moved, in all humility and eke timidity, to ask, Can Such Things Be?

It has often been pointed out by our English friends, with an infuriating sort of friendliness, that the desire for bigness in cities is an American habit of mind, arising largely out of the American mind's extremely youthful condition; and the observation is usually accompanied by the equally infuriating prophecy that we shall some day get over it, which will, of course, retroactively prove the worst imputations of present immaturity. And lo! Now comes the city of London, perhaps smarting a little from the fact of having to play second fiddle in point of size to the city of New York, and actually offers prizes in a contest for suggestions of the best method for making the town on the Thames the "magnet of the world." Or, if it isn't really the city of London that does it, the thing is done and conducted by somebody in and for that city; probably some newspaper reflecting with fidelity the desires of its readers, although how they find out those desires is much of a mystery to the present writer. However, we accept the assumption that becoming the magnet of the world is the present ambition of the city that has until lately been the largest aggregate of miserable humanity dwelling in one small spot.

Now, why, in the sacred name of private profit, should London wish to become the magnet of the world? It is already too large. The inhabitants do not, we understand, derive much intellectual stimulus from the points of one another's elbows driven several times daily into one another's ribs. Its busses have all they can do to haul the crowds, and its streets all they can do to accommodate the busses, and its barmaids have all they can do to serve the public with its "bitter," and its lords and young bucks have all they can do getting around to bus the barmaids; which somehow seems to complete the circle. What London would gain by disturbing this perfect balance we can not understand. Any sudden access of young bucks would necessitate an increase in the number of barmaids to be bussed, any access of population would call for more busses (gasoline) to haul it through the streets. In every activity the accommodations would be overcrowded, even more than they are at present. Yet somebody, concerned for London's prestige as the greatest city in the world, notwithstanding that the desire to be the greatest city in the world is a vulgar and infantile Americanism, offers prizes up to a thousand dollars for suggestions as to ways and means whereby London may regain its proud position at the top of the heap—a preeminence it used to pretend it cared nothing about.

And the capital prize in that contest was won by an Indiana girl: Miss Alice Young, a newspaper reporter of Mishawaka. Naturally. If you are going to be the biggest city, the place to learn how is where the biggest cities grow. She told London just what to do. Was there ever a woman that couldn't tell you just what to do? She said London should have brighter and cleaner stations, with warm waiting rooms and good restaurants. She may have had the station at Buffalo in mind. Its railways should all be electrified twenty miles out of town. The smoke nuisance should be abated—just like Pittsburgh. There should be an offering of prizes for the smartest business section—like Sixth Avenue, New York. Light wines should be sold at all hours. 'Ear! 'Ear! Eliminate street refuse. Take down all walls hiding gardens, whether the owners wished to surrender their bought-and-paid-for privacy or not. Have dancing and popular entertainment in the hotels, at popular prices, and provide clean, modern office buildings on the American plan. That's all. And it is as good as most advice. The great difficulty with the best advice in the world is the taking of it. If you wish to become rich, for example, the only thing needful is to buy stocks when they are low and sell them when they are high. But when is that? If Miss Young wishes to deal very generously with London she might refuse to accept that money until she is able to tell the Londoners how to carry out her programme.

It is said that the reason American Presidents are inaugurated on March 4th is that for centuries the quadrennial recurrence of the date can be trusted not to be a Sunday.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

An African was on trial in a Southern court for an offense against the dignity of the commonwealth. The jury filed in. His honor asked for the verdict. "We find the defendant guilty," the foreman replied, "and fix his punishment at thirty-five years in the penitentiary." You could hear a pin drop as the prisoner was asked: "Have you anything to say?" And, as he rose to his feet: "Yo' honor, I has only dis much ter say. You white gennens sure is mighty liberal wif some one else's time."

Mlle. Lenglen, the lawn tennis champion, said at a dinner while in New York: "I like America, and I particularly like the generous portions you give in your restaurants. In France, poor France, it is another story. I live in Nice, and one evening an American gentleman and his wife took me to dinner at one of the restaurants in the Avenue de la Gare—Avenue de la Victorie we call it now. Well, the American gentleman was a great wag, and he poked a great deal of fun at the mean little portions that were served to us. At the end of the meat course the waiter asked him: 'How did you find your steak, monsieur?' 'Oh, quite easily,' said the American; 'I'm a detective, you know.'"

Midnight, and in the smoking-room of a club sat a young man huddled in a chair. A friend entered. "Hello, Smith," he asked, cheerfully, "not going home yet?" "No," muttered the despairing one, "I—I daren't." "Why, what's the matter?" "Matter? It's the end of everything. It means ruin, grief, and a spoiled life!" The friend looked frightened. "Here, Smith, tell me what's up. Perhaps I can help you." Smith clinched his fists till the knuckles showed white. "No one can help me," he cried in agony. "I have come to the end of all things! At 8 o'clock I telephoned to my wife and gave her a perfectly good excuse for not coming straight home, and"—his voice sank to a whisper—"I've forgotten what I said."

He was a small, bow-legged, watery-eyed private in a colored stevedore company working at Brest. He was homesick and miserable. The morning after the news of the armistice he went to his sergeant, a big raw-boned, powerful colored boy from Texas, and said: "Sarge, I'se tired, an' I wants ter go back home ter Alabama. I has toted dese here boxes from de ships to de cars until my shoulder is done wore down to de bone. I 'listed for de duration ob de wah, an' now de wah is done over, an' I wants ter git on back home." The sergeant looked him over, and up and down. If looks could kill, he would have been dead. "Nigger," he said, "git yourself back on dat job! De wah am over! Dat's right! But de duration am just started!"

The head of one of the large American railroad companies was making inquiries with regard to acquiring a small branch line which belonged to one old man. "Now, as to the state of your road," he asked, "is it well and safely laid?" "Sir," replied the old man indignantly, "ours is the safest line in the country. I may say we have been running for over twenty years, and have never had a collision." "That's good!" exclaimed the big man. "And what's more, sir," went on the proprietor of the little line, "a collision would be impossible." "How do you make that out?" queried the other in surprise. "I know that the latest automatic devices are excellent, but 'impossible' is a big word." "It is literally true with us," was the proud rejoinder. "In what way?" "Well, sir, we have only one train."

Some years ago, before the auto-bus, Francois, a native Louisianian and a devout Catholic, had been in the employ of the small town's local livery stable driving the "hack" between the depot and the hotels. His employers one day became suspicious that Francois had not been turning into their office all the cash fares he was collecting and called him in. "Francois, how long have you been working for us?" "Oh, about twenty year." "How much are we paying you a month?" "Twenty dollar month." "Well, we have a new proposition now to make to you." "What it is?" asked Francois. "If you will go with us before your priest and make a solemn vow that you will turn into this office all the cash fares you collect we will pay you $100 a month." "Say," replied Francois, his eyes registering contempt, "you tink I'm dam fool, eh?"

"Scrambled eggs," ordered a customer in a city market restaurant. "Milk toast," murmured his companion, who was not feeling well. "Scramble two and a graveyard stew," sang out the waitress with the Titian hair. "Here," corrected the second man. "I want milk toast." "You'll get it, Buddy," replied the girl. "That's what they call milk toast down in Pittsburgh where I worked." The two customers held a conference and decided to "put one over" on the "fresh young thing" from Pittsburgh. The first one wanted a glass of milk and the second a cup of black coffee. When the girl appeared to put a "set up" of the restaurant artillery in front of the men the second man gave the following order: "A bottle of lacteal fluid for my friend and a scuttle of Java with no sea foam for me." "Chalk one an' a dipper of ink," shouted the girl. She didn't even smile.

Chairman Topping of the Republic Iron and Steel Company in Washington the other day said: "Tariff manipulators ought to understand trade conditions thoroughly. These men go wrong sometimes because they are too hasty. They remind me of the banker. A successful banker, having retired, thought he'd get up a stable. As he had no knowledge of horseflesh he decided he would take a little expert advice. He knew a livery stable keeper and he went to see the man. 'Thompson,' he said, 'I am going to buy a stable of horses. Now, when they are trotted out for my inspection, how will I tell how old they are?' I don't want to buy a lot of antiquated nags, you know." The liveryman said it was by their teeth that horses' ages were told. He intended to go into the matter a little further, but the millionaire, satisfied hurried off. The next day a fine coach horse was submitted to him by a dealer. 'How much do you want for this animal?' he asked. 'About $1200,' the dealer answered. The millionaire opened the horse's mouth and studied its teeth with slow care. Then wiping his hands, he laughed harshly. 'Take it away,' he said. 'It's thirty-two years old.'

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Large Order.

(On the departure for Europe of Dr. A. Edward Newton, the bibliophile, Carolyn Wells wrote him the following rhymed letter, which appears in his latest work, "A Magnificent Farce," from the press of the Atlantic Monthly.)

A. EDWARD NEWTON: Dear Friend and Philosopher:
Also your wife (tho' you'll never be boss of her!)
So you're to sail on the good Imperator
O'er Byron's justly famed deep, dark blue water.
As I sat musing,—up here in Connecticut,—
Your letter reached me, and you can just bet I cut Down to the shops of this hamlet Berkshirian,
Seeking a draught from the old spring Pierian.
For, I opined, no flowers or confessions—
Only a book—for the Man of Collections.
Certain conventions admit of no lenities,
Only a book for the Man of "Amenities."
Down to the village I went with celerity,
Said to the Shopman with eager asperity,
"I want a book for one A. Edward Newton—
Something high-priced and a bit hifalutin.
For it's a parting gift—sort of a souvenir;
No modern novel, dolled up in a new veneer!
Rather some old tome all leathery and lacquered,—
Some First Edition of Dickens or Thackeray—
Something that's truly a worth-while memorial
To one the Atlantic in lines editorial,
Says is 'of Letters a Doctor and Ornament!'"
(And I admit you're a handsome adornment!)
"Give me," I begged, "some unique Enchiridion,
Some precious copy of 'Epipsychidion',
Some ancient Horn Book, or rare Incunabula,"— Right here, his jaw dropped,—his eyes became globular;
"Show me," I went on, "a binding Zachnsdorfian,
To please this Minotaur Anthropomorphian;
A tall Shakespeare quarto, an Omar Khayyam,
An early edition of Bacon or Lamb—"

"Oh, say," his eyes shone, "there's a butcher next door—
A quarter of Lamb you can get at his store!"
More in sorrow than anger, I murmured, "Good-day."
Bookless, helpless, and hopeless, went sadly away.
And that is the reason, O A. Edward Newton,
No rare Rabelais, Rasselas, or Rasputin
To you as a parting remembrance I send.
From my over-full heart I can merely commend
Your soul to your Maker, your luggage to Cook,
And wait you "Bon Voyage" in place of a book.
May your buys over there be far more than your sells,
Is the wish of yours faithfully,
CAROLYN WELLS.

A printer had sore feet (says the Boot and Shoe Recorder). He had to stand for long hours at his case, setting up type and then distributing it back again from the forms. The floor became pretty hard after five or six hours of this, so he got hold of a rubber mat to stand on and put this in front of the case. But the printer's devil was full of mischief and would hide the mat during the noon hour or before the printer in question came to work. So in order to fool the printer's devil the printer-with-the-sore-feet worked out a scheme which, according to the traditions of the industry, laid the foundation for the whole business of rubber heels, now one of the considerable industries of the country running into millions of dollars. For the printer took his rubber mat and cut out soles and heels from it, tacked them on to his shoes, and thus equipped, went about his work in peace—in utter defiance of printer's devils and oblivious of the fact that he was founding a new industry.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

The committee of arrangements includes Messrs. John McGregor, David Duncan, Bruce Heathcott, John Lawson, James Vinter, John McNab, and J. C. Fyfe. Tickets for the dinner may be had upon application.

The French Section of the Museum of Arts.

The inauguration of the French Section of the Museum will take place on Friday afternoon, March 24th, at 2:30 o'clock, when a loan collection of selected French engravings from the Chalcographic Department of the Louvre, Paris, will be opened with a private view and reception to the friends and supporters of the Museum.

This collection presents the work of sixty-odd of the foremost eighteenth and nineteenth-century French engravers in the most brilliant impressions, thus giving a survey of this art at a time when France was supreme in the field of engraving. It comprises the names of the men who have made French engraving famous and includes such contemporary exponents of graphic art as Leopold Flameng, who died in 1911, and the present-day Emile Jean Sulpis, whose masterly plates sustain the tradition of his predecessors.

The Chalcographic Department of the Louvre was established by Louis XIV under the direction of Colbert, who secured the magnificent collection of engravings compiled by Monsieur de Marolles, Abbé de Ville Loin, that contained not less than 274 portfolios in which the works of the masters were methodically arranged from the origin of engraving up to 1616. The work begun by Louis XIV was continued by Louis XV and Louis XVI, who made important additions to the collection, which has been augmented since from time to time until today it is regarded as perhaps the foremost print collection in the world.

On this occasion the statue of Victor Hugo by August Rodin, which was the last work to come from the great French sculptor, will be unveiled and presented to the French Section of the Museum by Mr. Michel D. Weill on behalf of his uncle, the late Raphael Weill, and a collection of modern French etchings, lithographs, and wood cuts by members of the Barbizon school and by French impressionists will be presented to this section by a group of friends of the Museum. Among others this collection includes examples of the work of Manet, Cézane, Forain, and their predecessors, Corot, Daubigny, and Mallet. This is the first comprehensive collection of modern French graphic art so far made available to the public in San Francisco.

Director Laurvik is having the Victor Hugo bust installed opposite the entrance to the centre rotunda, where it will occupy one of the most imposing positions in the Museum. Mr. Neltner, consul-general of France, together with a reception committee composed of prominent San Franciscans and members of the French colony, will participate in the unveiling and presentation ceremonies, which are strictly by invitation to members and friends of the Museum.

An appropriate programme of French music will be rendered by Mrs. Rose Dear-dorff Shaw, who will play a group of Debussy; by Miss Marie Milliet, who will sing a group of early French songs, and by Lajos Fenster, who will render a group of modern French violin compositions. André Ferrier will recite in the original one of Victor Hugo's shorter poems, and Director Laurvik will deliver a brief eulogy on Rodin and the late Raphael Weill, the donor of the statue. The collections will be placed on public view the day after the inauguration.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

No woman is so angelic as to prefer a halo to a hat.—London Opinion.

"What is this proposed reciprocity with Canada?" "I believe they agree not to arrest our bootleggers."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Bibbie—How did ye hurt yer hand? Been fightin'? Eddie—Yep. Those were awful sharp teeth Sammy Jones used to have.—Life.

Customer (with week's beard)—Do you think that old razor will do it? Barber—It will, sir—if the handle don't break.—London Tit-Bits.

"No woman ever takes another woman's advice about frocks." "Naturally. You don't ask the enemy how to win the war."—London Opinion, from a Play.

"Never ask a girl for the makings." "Why not?" "Too careless. Get their tobacco all mixed up with face powder and lip rouge."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Old Lady—Dear me—has the little boy bumped his head? Little Girl—No, 'm; we was singin' outside a 'ouse an' some one emptied a water-jug on 'im. Old Lady—But how did he get that bump? Little Girl—That was it, mum—the water was froze!—London Passing Show.

Sunday-School Teacher—Nancy, why must we be kind to the poor? Nancy—Please, teacher, because in these days any of them might become rich.—Sydney Bulletin.

"These Edna M. Slime novels are sticking." "So I notice. Now, shall we offer her as a premium to boost Shakespeare, or shall we offer Shakespeare with her?"—Judge.

Conductor (new to the job)—I'm sure the old boy just here has paid his fare twice. Think I had better tell him about it? Motor-man—No-o! Ask him for it again.—Sydney Bulletin.

Class-Conscious Comrade (shipwrecked and nearing land)—Well, we've done our eight hours, Joe. Wot about knocking off? The Other—Righto! (Both drown.)—London Passing Show.

If appearances do not deceive us, the thing that is causing most discontent at the present time is the shortage of $6000 a year jobs with very little work attached to them.—Houston Post.

Bride's Kid Brother (at wedding)—No more quarters out of him now, I suppose—but I guess I can still work sis for hush money. He's awfully jealous of her old beaux.—Harper's.

Admiring Youth—You are quick at repartee. Miss Cayenne—I hope not. Women who are quick at repartee usually betray dispositions which leave them slow to marry.—Washington Star.

"You have been a long time!" "Yes. It took Paul a quarter of an hour to remember where the cloak-room tickets were." "And where were they?" "In my handbag!"—Munich Meggendorfer Blätter.

"Is your cook going to stay?" "It happens quite by accident," replied Mrs. Crosslots, "that she is." "How do you mean 'by accident'?" "She dropped a hot stove lid on her foot and can't travel."—Washington Star.

Mrs. Jones—Yes, Larry stayed over in England after the war. He works in a but-terine factory now and gets £30 a month. Mrs. Sylvester—Thirty pounds a month? What does he do with it? He can't eat all that!—Detroit News.

"If Foch had been an Englishman—" began an officer in a mess half a hundred miles behind the lines, to be interrupted disgustedly by his senior with: "Foch! Foch! If Foch had been an Englishman they'd have made him into a poor old area commandant, to look after the Chinese and see the billets were clean—like they've blankety-blank well done with me!"—London Morning Post.

Portrait.

Forlorn and lank her ravaged tresses hang,
Her skirt is bobbed to match her curtailed hair;
Across her brow a trimly scissored bang
Lies plasterwise; her eyebrows, plucked with care,
Are arched like segments of a chocolate heart;
Upon her cheeks red disks, from rouge-daubed rag,
Proclaim the matchless candor of her art,
Which found its model in the Nippon flag.
In fearsome contrast are the lips and nose
Of this much-tended face of eighteen years:
Below, a flame; above, dense arctic snows—
And yet no sign of natural thaw appears.

Now that I've done this honest portrait of her,
I wonder more than ever why I love her.

—Ben Ray Redman in Punch.

AFRICA, THE HOME OF HUMANITY?

The recent discovery in a cave in Northern Rhodesia of a human skull apparently many thousands of years old seems to put Africa on the map for the first time as the probable field of development for men who played an important part in the life of pre-historic Europe, says the New York Tribune. Where the most important old human skulls have been discovered heretofore and what their locations seem to indicate is told in the following bulletin from the Washington, D. C., headquarters of the National Geographic Society:

"Europe has long been recognized as merely the stage on which late acts of the great drama of the development of man and his civilization have been played. None of the races that have lived in Europe during the long period of man's life on earth is believed to have originated there. Hitherto all evidence pointed to Asia as the source of the succeeding waves of human immigrants as it was the source, at least approximately, of the thousands of horses, deer, and cattle that swarmed into the country during the inter-glacial periods.

"Races had come across the land bridges from Africa, but for the most part they had merely used Northern Africa as a path, coming from Arabia or Farther Asia. The one exception known was the strange appearance along the southern fringe of Europe at one time of a race akin to the negro pygmies of present-day Central Africa. But these small negroids were an unimportant factor and soon vanished.

"So far as Europe is concerned, the Heidelberg men were the earliest known human inhabitants. A single jawbone discovered in Germany represents the data from which conclusions have been drawn in regard to this race, which is supposed to have lived some 200,000 years ago. They are classed as the first wholly human beings of whom fossils have been discovered and are supposed to have been later by probably a quarter of a million years than the ape-man whose skull was discovered in Java.

"The Heidelberg men were apparently succeeded about 75,000 years ago by a long persisting type of whom many fossils have been found—the Neanderthal man. Skulls and bones of this widely diffused people have been found in France, Germany, Belgium, Croatia, on the Channel Isles, on the rock of Gibraltar, and in Malta. They were cave-dwelling hunters and for more than 50,000 years lived off the herds of horses, deer, and cattle that abounded in Europe during that period.

"These Neanderthal men were much more advanced than the men of Heidelberg, but still they were lower in the scale than any savage of the present day. They were squat, burly, big-headed, and thick-skulled. Their brows projected markedly over cavernous eyes, they were almost chinless, and their knees were permanently bent. The first skull of these people, discovered more than sixty years ago, was so widely divergent from existing skulls that one scientist insisted that it was a malformation. It was only after the discovery of other fossils that the former existence of this race was generally accepted.

"Though Neanderthal remains have been discovered at the very edge of northern Africa, notably in Gibraltar and Malta, there has been no general tendency to look upon Africa as the source of that people. The skull and bones recently discovered in northern Rhodesia, however, are believed to be of the general Neanderthal type, and their discovery opens up the possibility that it was from Africa that Europe's Neanderthal horde came. The 'broken hill skull,' as the African fossil is called, is in some ways more primitive than the European Neanderthal skulls, though it is believed to be more recent. These facts give added weight to the belief that the skull recently found was nearer than the European fossils to the original point of dissemination of the Neanderthal men.

"The Neanderthal men represent about the last-known types of humans with skull development lower than that of present-day savages. When they disappeared 25,000 or 30,000 years ago they were succeeded by the Cro-Magnon men, hunters and also artists, who have left remarkable drawings of animals on the walls of certain caves in France. They were a tall, finely built, intelligent race, the first known men generally rated as belonging to the same species as our own homo sapiens."

Rear-Admiral Bradley A. Fiske, inventor of the Fiske range-finder, radio control of moving vessels, and other devices used in navies, has obtained a patent on a new invention called the Fiske Reading Machine, designed to reduce reading matter to tabloid form and enable anybody to carry with him many copies of books without even bulging out his pockets. The machine is described in the New York Times as a narrow strip of aluminum, surmounted by a small magnifying glass. Bands of paper, on which reading matter is reproduced through photo-engraving in a space one-hundredth smaller than the original type, are passed through the machine as it is held in the hand, with the eye looking through the magnifying lens. Five of the paper bands, printed on both sides, contain about 100,000 words, the number of words in the average novel.

To be faithful, one must be dreadfully in love or dreadfully ugly.—London Opinion.

Hate Going Down.

With the ratification of the Four-Power treaty, and the prospects for ratification are good at this writing, we may come to a point where we can look forward to a cessation of hate as a policy; especially if the Irish can prevail upon themselves to stop shooting across the Ulster line. The settlement of the Irish trouble, and the Egyptian trouble, and the troubles with our own treaty irreconcilables, may make it possible to conduct our affairs for a little while without so much bitterness and gall. It would be a grand thing to wake up some morning and feel that we did not have to hate anybody that day and perhaps would not have to hate very actively for another week or so.

The thing has been getting tiresome. There was the case of Germany. We had to hate what she was doing for several years, and not to have hated it would have argued something very wrong with the person guilty of such neglect. We do not exactly love Germany yet, and would not contribute much for serenades and flowers for the Reich, but at least the days of boiling rage are past, and we can give that hate a rest as far as its active forms are concerned. But no sooner did we see such a rest in sight than Mr. Hearst began demanding that we hate England, and then France and Japan. Perhaps some did, but probably not many more than were already engaged in that activity. A cessation of the Irish troubles, if they ever will cease, would reduce a good deal of our Anglophobia to dead waste.

It has never been easy to hate the French. And now it seems unnecessary much longer to hate the Japanese.

Mr. Johnson has made more or less political capital out of his Japanophobia, but there are signs that it is beginning to peter out. The treaty fight ought to prove about the last of it. Here in California it has for some time been a politically profitable thing to promote, and a few dextrous politicians appear to feel that something can still be made of it, but unless the Japanese problem becomes pressing in new and unexpected forms it is likely that we can give ourselves a brief vacation from that duty and think about the opera or who the next senator from California will be.

This does not mean, of course, that we should begin right away to manifest snuggling affection for the subjects of the Mikado. That would probably be neither understood nor appreciated. It should be sufficient if for awhile we cease to regard them as active or potential enemies. We are certain to have them a good deal on our minds, because they are right across the ocean from us, and that ocean is not much wider now than the Mediterranean was between the ancient Romans and the Carthaginians. But having in effect agreed to restrict military operations each to its own side of the water, there is no reason remaining why the two countries may not for the time being, and perhaps for many years to come, confine their interchanges to peaceful diplomacy and trade. We are aware that by the peddlers of international hate this will be regarded as a great mistake, and denounced in terms as a suicidal policy. But hate is an emotion, and emotions are transient. We can not feel the same way, nor with equal intensity, all the time. And as a matter of psychology we can imagine a condition under which a people, having hated another people too long, and having become, as it were, overhated, or foundered on it, might experience a revulsion of feeling just at the wrong time and rush to embrace the enemy on the field of battle.

Of course, Japan has her Ireland; that is to say, Korea. And if we had as many Koreans voting in this country as there are descendants of the Emerald Isle, Japanophobia could be set down for an indefinite run. But we have rarely met an American who really cared a great deal what happened to the old government of Korea, recognized as about the most corrupt and worthless in the known world, except as an excuse for hating Japan. So that we may expect hatred of Japan to subside little by little and the two peoples to get into a frame of mind which will enable them to avail themselves of each other's arts and ideas without keeping knives up their sleeves.

Yes, it looks as though it might become a better world for a little while. Even Theodore Bell has ceased to hate the Republican party, "and yet," to paraphrase Porphyria's Lover, "Gavin McNab has not said a word."

America and Russia.

The interest of the American people in the Russian people is just what it has been ever since the dark days of the civil war, when Russia proved her friendship for the Union. We wish them nothing but good, and can not look with complacency on any schemes of outside nations to rob them of their territory while they are helpless. The refusal to recognize the present so-called government, which is not a government in any worthy sense and has done nothing to merit recognition, is another matter. When 600,000 active manipulators, fired with a ruthless social fanaticism, seize autocratic power over 160,000,000 helpless people, and rob some, and kill others, and afflict the survivors in every imaginable way, and reduce a vast and potentially wealthy country to such straits of want that the population starves by millions and mothers are said to eat their children, it does not help the victims at all to "recognize" their despoilers and oppressors. That is the record, in brief, of the Soviet power. The blockade had very little to do with it—practically nothing. Such a country as Russia could easily have lived within itself and found in the blockade only stimulus for internal development that would have made it permanently self-sufficing. But the effort to wipe out private profits and destroy capital had its inevitable sequel in a great nation's paralysis. Russia is very sick, and socialism is its disease. The people of this country hope she will recover, but the hope is not lively under present conditions.

Islam's Awakening.

When an American brought up as a Baptist, or a Presbyterian, or a Methodist, or a Roman Catholic, or a Campbellite, undertakes to read the Koran, he is usually puzzled by its lack of continuity, its discursiveness, its off-hand dealing with any and every subject that occurred to its author, its absence of anything resembling connected plot or story. When it comes to interpretation the possibilities are rich, for ambiguity seems to open the way in every other paragraph. But to get any clear and definite notion of what the leading characters did and why they did it, or even who they were and what their early surroundings and home influences, seems beyond the mere Western intellect. The Koran is said to have been written on separate palm leaves and then gathered into a book. Anybody who will try to write a book that way will find it very difficult to pursue a logical sequence or produce an orderly result. In the absence of filing cabinets and card indices, by the time the last palm tree in the oasis had been defoliated, a lot of leaves from the first tree would have been lost, and several from the other trees as well. The protests of the owner of the date grove would not assist composition. And altogether the ultimate product might be expected to read a good deal like a dictionary, or thesaurus, or book of synonyms. The more a Westerner reads in the Koran, the less he seems to be finding out, until it becomes a relief to turn to a daily newspaper, even though the guesses of the correspondents about Washington affairs may not always seem closely related.

Nevertheless, the inhabitants of this globe are not all Western men, nor Northern, nor Southern. A great many of them dwell east of a given point—say Timbuctoo—and of these about 300,000,000 appear to believe that Mohammed did all that could be expected of him when he undertook to produce a work that should set everything right in the world. Many of them are sure that if the Koran were accepted as the universal authority everything would be as it should; and at times in the past Mohammedans have manifested great impatience with peoples that have been so blind and stubborn as to oppose the reconstruction of society on the Mohammedan plan.

Had Mohammedan countries continued to progress in Western science as rapidly as the magnificent intellectual achievements of the Caliphate of Cordova once promised, we could today rely upon a weakening of the well-known theological (and surgical) passion, and upon the dominating influence of secular and peaceful motives. But after having helped lay the bed plates of Western science the Arabian civilization in Spain was expelled and destroyed, and nothing remotely resembling it ever reasserted itself in the Mohammedan world. It was not his religion nor his polygamy that made the Turk the "sick man of Europe," but his lack of scientific attainment, of the daily discipline and drill of a civilization dependent for its existence and operation on exact physical knowledge.

And that is the reason why Islam is dangerous today. Its fanaticism is strong because its exact knowledge is weak. Its early spread was astounding, so much so that in a single century it had extended itself over a greater area than the Roman Empire. To primitive, simple peoples it makes an appeal like a contagion, and today it belts the world right across Africa and Asia, into China and the Philippines; and Lord Northcliffe on his westward voyage finds his first mosque in the Fiji Islands. If Christianity had not been geographically in the way it is possible the Eskimos would now be followers of the Prophet. Without Charles Martel and Jan Zbieszki, the probability is that they would have been.

Since the days of Xerxes, Asia has been the peril of Europe. For centuries European statesmanship has had to carry Asia on its mind. The common people could forget Ghengiz Khan and Mahmoud II, but the historian and the diplomat have had to understand that Asia does not change, and at any time may produce another organizing strategist to be reckoned with.

Western Europe is a long time recovering from the recent upheaval, and is in no condition for a resumption of world hostilities. Yet the results of that upheaval have been to unify and revivify Islam, and make it conscious of wrongs and insults in far greater degree than the German propagandists before the war were able to accomplish. The whole Mohammedan world today has been embittered by Zionism, and Zionism wasn't worth it. It has been embittered by the Anatolian adventure of the royalist Greeks, and that adventure wasn't worth it. It has been embittered by the humiliation of the Sultan, head of the Islamic religion, and that probably was worth it, but ought to have been achieved before, when Europe was stronger. The French protectorate over Syria and the establishment of the Kingdom of the Hedjaz appear to be additional grievances. Whether turning Egypt over to an Albanian king, or at least the descendant of an Albanian, is going to do much to placate feelings so deep and so vengeful is problematic. The situation has grown quite serious, and in the contemplation of Lord Northcliffe has possibilities of broad and expansive trouble.

Of this trouble the recent developments in India are a symptom. If the British were to withdraw tomorrow, the Mohammedans would probably make themselves masters of the peninsula, whence they would be in a pretty good position to organize all Islam against the Western world. The main difficulty appears to be in the renewed consciousness of Islam, which has been more or less somnolent for several generations. We seem about to be confronted with the yellow peril under Mohammedan auspices—but the old British Empire has muddled through a great many tight places and can probably muddle through this one.

The Law and the Lawyer.

There is something to be said for both sides of the question that is agitating members of the Bar Association, present and prospective. In a sense the future character of the Bar Association and the legal profession hangs in the balance. Theoretically, a change may be for the better or the worse. Actually, changes have a way of being inevitable and rather more often for the better than the worse. The trouble with legal science is precisely that it changes so little. It has been said that the law is at least three hundred years behind its fellow scientific callings, though there is something rather funny in even thinking of the law as a scientific profession, so hidebound is it by tradition. Only the other day a case was decided in England obviously unfairly, because there was still on the statute books a law dating from the rule of King Canute to the effect that a wife can not be held for breaking the law if she does so at her husband's instigation. Either the weaker sex was not considered responsible, or the economic side of the problem was taken into consideration. A wife cast off by her criminally-minded husband would probably fall to the care of the state. English law is an archaic institution and the American variation is in little better case. A cynic might be moved to remark that any change would be for the better.

The foregoing, however, has to do with the theory of the law. The Bar Association's proposal is primarily concerned with its practice. The healthy symptom is that any change at all should be sought in an institution that seems to be a direct descendant of the law of the Medes and Persians, so undeviating has been its course. And, remarkable to relate, the proposed change comes from within and not without. It is a case of "Physician, cure thyself," and it remains to be seen whether or not the bar can deal justice to itself. It would seem, a priori, that if the bar and its functionaries can not adequately settle the moot question whether or not a college education should be prerequisite to the practice of law, no one could settle it. Popular opinion, however, can always settle anything, in its own estimation. In the present instance popular opinion veers rather toward an opposition to the association's proposal. The sentimental objection that Lincoln himself would have been barred is too weak for serious rebuttal. When men of one-hundredth of Lincoln's ability acquire college educations in the teeth of adversity, it is giving our great American little credit indeed to suppose that he could not have made the grade. The real popular objection is an inherent one with the American people. It is the line of least resistance—the same thing that tends to lower the bars at our state universities; the path should not be made hard, but easy—quantity, not quality.

However, there is one legitimate objection to the proposed measure. A college education injures no one of strong mental calibre. There is no insidious evil there. The danger lies in the direction of still greater crystallization of the law. The present system allows men of the common people who have not become transmuted by an academic career to act as a leaven among the greater number that have. The danger lies in having so vital an institution removed even a degree further from the needs of the common people. It is a question which is the lesser evil—the suppression of shysters and ignoramuses or the academizing of a great human institution. After all, the chief argument in favor of the change is that it is a change.

Again the Newberry Case.

The fact that the Newberry case has been settled decisively and finally does not prevent certain pettifoggers and demagogues in the Senate from continual and contumelious reference to it. The purpose, plainly enough, is grossly partisan. What is desired is to create the impression in the country that Newberry, after being corruptly elected, was seated corruptly in the Republican interest. The effect of these endeavors has been to bring to Newberry's support certain powerful moral forces. On Friday of last week Senator Poin-dexter, taking note of efforts to make a continuing scandal of the Newberry case, introduced a letter written by the late President Roosevelt at a time when Newberry had won nomination in the Michigan primary. Addressing Newberry, Mr. Roosevelt said:

I congratulate you on your nomination, but far more do I congratulate Michigan and all our people. It was my good fortune to have you serve under me as Secretary of the Navy, and I can testify personally to your efficiency and your disinterested and single-minded zeal for the public service. To a very peculiar degree you have stood for that kind of government which puts the interest of the people as a whole first and foremost, and treats all other considerations as negligible when the public weal is involved. * * * Michigan is facing the test, clear-cut and without shadow of a chance for misunderstanding, between patriotism and Americanism on one side, and on the other pacifism and that foolish sham cosmopolitanism which thinks it clever to deride the American flag and to proclaim that it would as soon be a Hindu or Chinaman as an American. If there should be at any time in the future a Hindu Senate, and it should choose, in a spirit of cosmopolitanism, to admit outsiders, there is no reason why Mr. Ford should not aspire to membership therein, but he would be signally out of place in the American Senate so long as that body is dominated by men who zealously believe in the American ideal and faithfully endeavor to serve the American people.

This was written in October, 1918, at a time following the August primary, in which Newberry as a candidate for the Republican party won over Ford, and prior to the November election, in which Newberry again won as the Republican candidate as against Ford, this time in the character of Democratic nominee. Mr. Roosevelt is not the only man of high moral and patriotic prestige who, having carefully weighed the circumstances attending the Newberry case, gave judgment in Newberry's favor. Senator Pepper of Pennsylvania, a man of the highest character, entered the Senate only a few days prior to the vote by which Newberry was given his seat. His analysis of the case is probably the clearest of the many given to the public. Noting the expenditure made by Newberry's friends in the August primary (Newberry being absent from the state in war service), Senator Pepper said:

This money was all spent for purposes authorized by the Michigan statute governing election expenses. Whether the money was wasted or wisely spent is a matter of opinion. It is likewise a matter of opinion as to how much money it is justifiable to spend on campaign publicity. * * * The people chose Newberry and rejected Ford by a clear majority of over 4000 votes. Nobody contended in the Senate that this election was other than fair or that money had been used improperly to influence it. The entire expenditure under attack was a preliminary expenditure. Newberry, having been duly elected, and the judgment of conspiracy to defraud entered against him having been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, was sworn in as a senator and began the discharges of his duties. Ford, having thus been twice defeated, once by his fellow-citizens and once by the highest court in the land, added still another to his list of affronts to patriotism and decency by instituting in the Senate a contest to wrest Newberry from his seat, although Ford himself had no possible claim of title to it.

The question before the Senate thereupon was this: Where a senator is fairly chosen by a majority of the voters of his state after a full public discussion of the expenditures made previous to the primary, shall the Senate vote to expel him on the ground that it would have been in better taste for the majority of voters to vote the other way? In other words, shall the Senate substitute its judgment for that of the people of Michigan as to what is a reasonable pre-primary expenditure?

From the moment that I perceived this to be the real question in the case I was never in doubt about the answer. Some senators who were opposed to expulsion thought fit to couple their conclusion with a condemnation of so large an expenditure. Personally, I had no opinion on the subject, because enormous publicity expenditures are a necessary incident of the direct primary system. My view was—and is—that where charges of corruption are not sustained and where the whole question is one of the reasonableness of the expenditure the people of the state are themselves the final judges and that the Senate should not disturb their verdict. I accordingly voted against expulsion, although if I had been framing the resolution I would have framed it differently. I have heard the subject twice reargued in the Senate since the final vote was taken, and these posthumous arguments, which were both vehement and vitriolic, have confirmed me in my opinion that any other discussion would have been the mongrel offspring of malice and muddled thinking.

Senator Pepper's presentment puts the matter in clear moral light. Without justifying heavy expenditure in primary elections, it exhibits the reason for it under the direct primary system. Either the candidate or his friends must put his views and judgments before the voting public, or the voting public must be left to declare its preference without adequate information of the candidate's character and views. No moral issue as related to Newberry was in question, since he did not participate personally in the primary campaign and made no contribution to it. The point for the Senate to consider, as Senator Pepper points out, was not the propriety of campaign expenditures, but the legality of Mr. Newberry's election, and with respect to that no issue was raised. Surely it is time to drop this matter, certainly in so far as there may be involved in it any reflection upon the moral status of Mr. Newberry.

So far as Newberry himself is concerned, the incident is closed. To pursue him further would be an exercise in slander. There remains open, however, the question as to the propriety of primary expenditure. Here there is room for difference of judgment. Obviously, under the direct primary system, there is need of preliminary exploitation of the qualifications of candidates—of "campaigns" that can only be made by the candidate or his supporters at very considerable cost. The alternative is return to the convention system. Which is the better way? The mind of the Argonaut is entirely clear. It does not claim—indeed nobody can pretend—that the convention system is ideal. But it has at least the merit of bringing to congressional service men of higher qualifications than the direct primary system has yielded. Under the convention system candidates are selected; under the direct primary system candidates select themselves. Thus, automatically, men of modesty stay in the background while self-seekers come to the front. Whoever will compare the official organization of the country—including members of the Senate and the House of Representatives—can not fail to see that there has been a sharp decline both in the intellectual and the moral fibre of men commissioned in public life.

Modernizing Ourselves.

President Harding has been subjected to some rather pointed and authoritative criticism recently because of his appointment of two senators on the American delegation to the late Conference. It is pointed out that "lifting" members of the legislative branch of the government over into the executive branch, and assigning to them labors of treaty drafting or treaty negotiating, is opposed to the spirit of the Constitution, which jealously discriminates between the three different governmental functions, legislative, judicial, and executive, and seeks to keep them rigorously separate. In this case it is pointed out that the employment of Senators Underwood and Lodge is a more serious matter than that of one man holding two positions—it tends to a confusion of the requisite checks and balances of our political organization, and also to such a confusion of duties that the necessary limits of responsibility are obscured and partly erased. In other words it has become, or soon will become, impossible to tell where legislative responsibility ceases and executive begins, which is a state of affairs in direct contravention of our institutions.

There is merit in the criticism. The men who drafted the Constitution were sharp observers of political dynamics. Some of them had suffered in their dearest interests from political abuses under a system which in their day still sought to make the will of the executive the law of the land. Hamilton had not so suffered, but he was a keen student of laws, and in addition he was a business man and knew about how such things could always be trusted to work. The Constitution's clear-cut tripartite division of governmental powers reflected the most advanced opinion of the time as to what the people needed for their safety from tyrants. And inasmuch as they did not purpose to permit the country to become entangled in European intrigue they saw no reason why treaty making, which is also law making, should not be subject to the revision at least of the upper house of the law-making body. Undoubtedly it should be.

But that is a different matter from saying that the two branches should do no work in common in a business so vital as the preliminary negotiations. That seems to have been a Wilsonian error which President Harding did not purpose to commit. President Wilson did not care to have the Senate represented at Versailles. About those negotiations on which the fate of the world depended he seemed willing that the law-making branch might learn what it could from the newspapers and then reject or ratify. It rejected. President Harding might have proceeded in the same manner to a similar result, but not being a Bourbon he preferred to profit by the Wilsonian experience. He determined that this time the Senate should be implicated in and accessory to the executive labors of negotiation, and so thoroughly involved that it never could complain of having been ignored. Both parties were represented, quite properly, in a matter which was not of either party separately, but of both and of the nation.

And it has worked. By the time this number of the Argonaut is out the treaty will probably have been ratified, but even in the disastrous event of its defeat the arrangement has operated well to this extent, that the senatorial debates have been informed throughout, because Senators Lodge and Underwood have been there with the intimate knowledge of the executive's case and ready for all objectors, just as members of a British ministry are always ready for interpolations on the floor of the House of Commons. This has driven the opposition members to terrible but almost legitimate exertions, and has robbed them, Republicans and Democrats alike, of the personal grievance and senatorial dignity argument, which would have been without merit, but would inevitably have been resorted to under the promptings of Mr. Hearst and the senator from Rumpus Ridge. In fact, with the exception of a few rather noisy episodes, the course of the treaties in the Senate has been a debate rather than a rumpus.

The Constitution may not have provided for exactly the sort of machinery President Harding devised to meet the Pacific problem. But it should be remembered that when that revered instrument was drafted there was no Pacific problem. There were many things for which it could not provide—notably the emancipation of the slaves. Moreover, the national isolation which the founders thought could be preserved to the end of the national story is gone. We are entangled in foreign affairs, both European and Asiatic, and it were the height of folly to ignore or deny the fact. The thing has come about very largely through the development of certain mechanical and military arts, improvements in communication and in navigation, as well as through the vast expansion of manufacturing and foreign commerce, until all the larger wars of the future threaten to involve us exactly as the great war involved us, and therefore threaten to affect the fortunes and the livelihood of the humblest member of our industrial and commercial system. Think back to 1914 and recall how little interest we had in the assassination at Sarajevo. At that time our diplomacy was largely a matter of making some reciprocity bargains and agreements not to discriminate against goods hauled in foreign bottoms. It could well be taken care of in the precise way laid down in the Constitution. What sane person could so regard our foreign interests now?

For diplomacy of importance there was vital need of exactly such machinery, or organization, as President Harding devised when he drafted Senators Lodge and Underwood from the legislative branch of the government to do a piece of work in the executive branch, in order that when that work got into the legislative branch for ratification or rejection, it might there be received without prejudice and treated with intelligence. The President's policy in the matter not only disarmed much malice in advance; it was broad and wise, and in addition it was constructive. Instead of being criticized as a violation of the Constitution it ought to be received by the public as an addition to the Constitution and made by future chief executives the practice in all our diplomacy of a critical character. If the Constitution makes the Senate a participant in the adoption of a treaty, the Senate should be a participant in the negotiation of it, when the treaty is important. Neither the executive nor the legislative branch of the government is going to lose anything by it. The only branch that might lose by it is that consisting of the irreconcilables, which is one the fundamental law did not seem to contemplate.

Editorial Notes.

There is cause for grave concern in the condition of the Associated Charities, whose report for 1921 is summarized in this issue of the Argonaut. The organization is confronted both by an increasing deficit and by growing demands for relief. So serious is the situation that unless substantial support is contributed very soon many and perhaps all of the association's activities will have to be curtailed, or even given up entirely; a tragedy no such community as this would care to contemplate.

The New York Times calls the credit bonus scheme "a bill to cut off banking accommodations to farmers as well as to business and commerce." This is because the credit that would go to the American Legion under the Fordney plan, a credit extended to get votes, would reduce by just that much the credit available for productive enterprise. It is strange how the mind of the politician, once centered on votes, forgets the fundamental principle of finance, which is the fundamental principle of physics and mechanics and everything else mundane: that you can't make something out of nothing, that you can't eat your cake and have it, too, that if you have four apples and take two away you will only have two left. It is like trying to teach a Chinaman why there can not be such a thing as perpetual motion. The main function of a financier in the government is to keep in mind that there are only 100 cents in a dollar and that the thing can not be made to stretch. Fortunately we have such a financier at the head of the treasury.

The American Federation of Labor's Washington lobby, or "Joint Legislative Conference" as it is euphemistically called, has condemned the Jones ship subsidy bill, not on the ground that it is not a good bill for the country as a whole, or would not assist in promoting the merchant marine, but because for one thing the naval reserve section of it "provides for a body of men who are to be used in case of strikes or lockouts." That has a good old reminiscent sound, as of the days before the great war. Nothing could be done then and apparently nothing can be done now to increase the nation's defensive strength if by any possibility it might be perverted to the uses of a police force in case of strike or lockout. Just what is it the Federation of Labor thinks it might want to do in case of a strike or lockout that would be interfered with by the naval reserve section of the ship subsidy act?

There seems to be no limit to what Ambrose Bierce called "the horrors of peace." Political campaigning by wireless telephony has begun.

Compulsory work for women is to be imposed by the Bulgarian peasant government. The peasant women who do manual labor, say partisans of the law, will take pleasure in "seeing those ladies in silk stockings" rustle about a bit. The law is to be applied first in the capital, Sofia, then in the smaller cities and eventually in the villages and country, where, however, custom and necessity leave few idle.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

From an Overheated Champion of the Bonus.

MANKATO, MINNESOTA, March 13, 1922.
THE ARGONAUT, SAN FRANCISCO—Gentlemen: I wish to let you know that I believe you are a bunch of cowards. If my last letter was personal, then know that your last editorial was also very much personal.

For your benefit I hope the Japs bombard the Pacific Coast some night and that all these silver-heeled patriots get routed out in the a. m. to take a little mustard with their breakfast.
Very truly,
GEORGE SWANSON.

Pertinent But Hardly Practicable.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 16, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In the matter of "The Adjusted Compensation Bill," it is one thing to pass the bill and please everybody, and quite another thing to raise the money for it and please everybody.

Might I suggest that one way to make the difference clear to those most interested would be for the powers who must raise the money to intimate, that if the bill becomes a law, the most equitable manner of raising the necessary funds will be by assessing a poll tax of $5 per annum on every adult man or woman entitled to vote on national matters until the needed amount is raised.

For a great many voters this may seem like "giving until it hurts," but it will attest their 100 per cent. patriotism and their regard for the soldier's need of the proposed bonus.

Also it might show the congressmen who are eager to pass the bill in what way they will inevitably incur a just though ignominious form of resentment from the voters who might choose to administer it until it hurt—like a swift kick "from the back of the beyond."
THE MAN FROM JAPAN.

The Pride of the Soldier

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I was married in 1860, and when the slogan sounded, "We're coming, Father Abraham, a hundred thousand strong," my husband was swept along, and I, having only a baby boy to provide for, went back to teaching. When the men came back—those who did; mine found a grave in Southern earth—they went to work at whatever they found to do. Of course, they had no candy and doughnuts served to them and no girls had been provided to recite, sing, and dance for them; perhaps that kept them humble and willing to pick up loose ends and just do their best, until the lawyers started the race for pensions. But the majority were proud of their service and became the backbone of our country, rising to all kinds of eminence; but never stooping to ask for alms in any form.

There must be something radically wrong in the way our children are prepared for life; which seems to be explained by the books I read, regarding the child in all its phases and written by spinsters of both sexes, who have never known the gamut of a parent's feelings and understanding. Had these young men been taught manly pride and true patriotism they could not stoop to ask for alms and step down to being common mercenaries. And so many of the claimers never even saw "Flanders' Fields," but stayed right here and now play at being heroes.

While nothing we can feel or do for those who upheld our country's honor, whether with blood and suffering or not, is sufficient, yet to yield to unjust demands would be inexcusable and I wish to thank you for the fearlessness and candor with which the Argonaut has fought for the right and is still doing it.
Most appreciatively,
MRS. WILLA A. LEONARD.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

THE PASSPORT NUISANCE.

(Manchester Guardian.)

Holland has been able of late to make arrangements with France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Luxembourg under which travelers of Dutch nationality will no longer have to obtain a visa from the authorities of these countries. Only the production of a passport is now necessary. These agreements are, of course, reciprocal.

Members of the Dutch First Chamber having inquired whether it would not be possible to suppress the passport visum altogether, the Minister of Foreign Affairs replied that he has been striving to attain this end. He mentioned, however, specifically that all the efforts of the Dutch government to make with the British government an arrangement similar to the one explained above had led to no result. It would be interesting to know the reasons invoked by the British authorities for their refusal to suppress the visum between Great Britain and Holland. They have already made such an agreement with France and Belgium; why, therefore, should they raise obstacles against Holland?

This attitude of the British government is all the more surprising as relations between Great Britain and Holland have been extremely cordial of late years, whereas the relations between Holland and Belgium have been somewhat strained.

NOT EXACTLY MORIBUND.

(New York Times.)

Forecasts of the British budget, to be presented by the chancellor of the exchequer before the end of this month, are that a small surplus will be reported for the current fiscal year. This would be surprising, after the way in which the estimates of revenue were shot to pieces by the strikes of last summer. Still more surprising is the report that the chancellor sees his way to reducing the income tax a shilling in the pound. Such a cut would be as popular as unexpected, and the cynical minded will see in it convincing proof that the government is preparing for a general election. But there is no doubt that England has been steadily improving her financial position.

In a recent speech in the city of London the lord chancellor went so far as to assert that its old "financial supremacy," making London "the central nerve of the finance of the world," was now being restored. Whether the facts fully bear him out on that point or not, there can be no doubt that Lord Birkenhead is correct in assigning the causes for the remarkable recovery. Great Britain has refused to walk in "the primrose path of unsound finance." She has met expenses by savings and by taxes, not by printing currency. She has toiled and stinted herself and patiently waited. Now she is beginning to reap the rewards of clinging stubbornly to the sound methods of finance and of commerce which generations have demonstrated to Englishmen to be true wisdom and from which they have no idea of departing.

COMMON INTERESTS WITH THE DOMINION.

(The American Review of Reviews.)

There is no country more gallant than Canada—none with a better record in recent times. And there is no other that is bound to the United States by so many ties of mutual interest and of friendly association. Canada's place is now distinctly fixed in the group of peoples called the British Commonwealth, and it is henceforth understood that the Dominion is entirely independent in all that pertains to her own affairs. Thus she will be at liberty to send an ambassador of her own to Washington whenever it may seem desirable. She has long made her own tariff arrangements without dictation or interference from London. As we have more than once remarked in these pages, it is high time that a seat was made for Canada in the council room of the Pan-American Union at Washington. At this stage in tariff discussion it should be strongly urged by those who look well into the future that the welfare of the two halves of North America are to be regarded as identical. To create ill-will by tariff legislation at Washington, when we are trying to create good-will by all other means, would be harmful in any direction—transatlantic, transpacific, or southward; but it would be especially mischievous and unsound as a policy directed against our Canadian friends, whose prosperity is only less vital to us than is that of our own states.

IRRECONCILABILITY.

(Portland Oregonian.)

Senator Johnson, Senator Borah, Senator France, and Senator La Follette—the irreconcilable four, reconciled by their irreconcilability to stand together for one reconciled moment—voted for the Robinson amendment, in order to destroy the treaty, not to amend it, not to put a mere reservation on it. If it had been adopted they would in turn have voted against the amended treaty. They would have done it because they are the irreconcilables.

It is useless perhaps to ask why they are irreconcilables. As well ask one to explain the mystery of life, or of the creation, or of evil, or man, or woman, or ghosts. They are irreconcilables because they are irreconcilables. What Harding is for, they are against. What Hughes is for, they are against. What the Republican party is for, they are against. What the decent opinion of mankind is for, they are against.

We should like to see a direct referendum on the Four-Power pact in Idaho and in California. Undoubtedly these states would endorse the pact and thus by their votes repudiate Borah and Johnson. Nor have we any doubt that in any election these states would endorse Borah and Johnson. More irreconcilability. They want the treaty, which means peace in the Pacific and for America, and they want Borah and Johnson, which means war in the Senate, and great difficulty in getting for Idaho and California, in common with all the other states, what Idaho and California do their utmost to prevent by sending Borah and Johnson to the Senate. But Idaho and California, by ratification of the treaty in the Senate, will get what they want, in spite of themselves.

CALL THE TROOPS HOME.

(New York Herald.)

The claim of the United States of $241,000,000, filed against the account of German reparations and presented to the Allied finance ministers now sitting in Paris, came as a shock to the Allies. It is causing wide discussion among them, but not sufficient disturbance to have swerved them from the scheduled distribution of the one billion German gold marks to England, France, and Belgium.

Before the American claim was presented the finance ministers had made their distribution plans and they went straight through without change and without regard to or consideration for the American claim.

Apparently the Allies had accepted it as a matter of course that America would present no bill for the services of her troops on the Rhine, though why this view isn't clear. The burden of comment, both officially and from the press, is that, while America's position with regard to this matter may have a measure of justice, yet the way for her to collect the money on her claim is exceedingly obscure.

One suggestion is that America collect it from sequestered German funds in the United States, but one of the highest diplomatic and legal authorities in the French government has pointed out that Germany can not pay out a single mark without the consent of the Reparations Commission and that should the United States seek to collect this claim from Germany the Allies would protest.

In view of the general attitude of the Allies with regard to this $241,000,000 claim it looks, on the face of it, as if America's contribution to the military forces on the Rhine hasn't been very good business for her; looks as if a continuation of her troops on the Rhine in this situation would be worse business; looks as if the sensible thing for America to do is to bring her troops home without further delay.

This would have the effect of eliminating discussion and misunderstanding as to future charges for their services. They have been there three and a half years and there is no convincing reason why they should remain there any longer, there is no convincing evidence that they are performing any worth-while service by remaining there.

THE GREATEST ON EARTH.

(New York Times.)

Once more the great free West has put New York in its place. No sooner does Columbia University announce an enrollment of 32,240, with the modest commentary that this seems to give our city the largest university in the world, than the University of California proclaims a student body of 43,266, "without including the university farm."

The idea of a university seems to have been greatly expanded in recent decades. Columbia, for example, has some 2800 undergraduates and 8200 graduate and professional students; the remaining 21,000 are counted in the summer school and extension courses. Girls to whom a summer in New York is the only alleviation of the humdrum routine of schoolteaching in a small town, and to whom the Columbia summer school is the only excuse for a trip to New York, go to swell the total, as well as the immense horde who go in for the various forms of "extension."

Extension, according to physicists and logicians, is usually gained at the expense of intension; but some of our most extended universities are our best. Meantime, salutations to California, which has assembled the greatest grand glittering galaxy of students known in all history, and without the added attraction which brings so many to a summer school located in New York City. The University of California covers the state with its extensions: from Shasta's icy mountain to Colorado's coral strand, where Mack Sennett's bathing beauties play in the golden sand. A worthy incarnation of the greatest of states, where no frost can damage the crops of superlatives.

Giovanni Verga, the novelist, died in January at Catania, aged eighty-two years. His literary importance was not less than that of D'Annunzio. His novels of country life, with their stern moral message, remind one somewhat of Hardy. Their range may be less, but some may regard their art as stronger. Verga was the first Italian novelist to follow the naturalist movement and to break with the romantic tradition of Manoni. He wrote a play, "Cavalleria Rusticana," which furnished the subject for Mascagni's opera.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, who was recently in Ypres, is one of the donors of the fund to rebuild the Gothic Cloth Hall.

Mirza Hussein Khan Alai is Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Persian government in the United States.

Lillian Russell is in Europe with her husband, Alexander P. Moore, to study immigration problems at the request of President Harding and Secretary Davis of the Department of Labor.

One of England's foremost liquor manufacturers was elevated to the peerage in the king's New Year honor list. Sir James Buchanan, now Lord Buchanan, quite properly hails from Glasgow.

Mrs. Alexander Gross, fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, who recently returned from a trip of exploration to Brazil, has gone to Paris to report her discovery of a radium mine to Mme. Curie.

Commander Hayne Ellis, U. S. N., has been selected by Secretary of the Navy Denby to be his personal aide. He succeeds Captain David Sellers, U. S. N., who has been made commander of the U. S. S. Maryland.

The Marchioness Curzon, a titled American, who was formerly Miss Grace Hinds of Alabama, daughter of the late J. Monroe Hinds, American Minister to Brazil, has been created Dame, Grand Cross, of the British Empire.

Spain is following in the footsteps of England and America as an up-to-date country should. Her parliament is soon to be graced by a woman, Señora Carmen León, who has been nominated for a seat in the Spanish law-making body by the Romanones party in Madrid.

Mrs. Nelson P. Radick of Fulda, Minnesota, was the first farm woman to appear before the Senate Agricultural Committee to aid in attempts to obtain adequate prices for farm produce. She is a director of the United Society of Agriculture, of which Benjamin C. March is the managing director.

Dr. Henry A. Rusby, who headed the biological expedition into the wilds of the Amazon basin, has been obliged by ill health to return to this country. Dr. Rusby, who is dean of the College of Pharmacy of Columbia University, has brought with him several new narcotic drugs, which the scientific world hopes will be valuable additions to pharmaceuticals.

José M. Seron of the Radio Corporation of America, a Chilean, twenty-eight years old, has set a new world's record for the reception of continental code by wireless. The record was formerly held by B. G. Seutter of the wireless station of the New York Times. Seutter was placed second this year. Seron came to this country less than two years ago with little knowledge of English and of radio.

Miss Anna Vaughan Hyatt, American sculptor, has been decorated by the French government with the insignia of the chevalier of the Legion of Honor in recognition of her famous Joan of Arc statue. Miss Hyatt is a pupil of Gutzon Borglum. She was awarded a silver medal at the San Francisco Exposition in 1915 and the Rodin gold medal at Philadelphia in 1917. She is curator of sculpture of the French Museum of Art in the United States.

It was rumored some time ago that Mme. Raymond Poincaré intended to run for the office of deputy at the next election. At present no French law permits women to vote or hold office. But the news was that the premier was working for such a law and that the wife of the premier would be one of the first women to profit by it. Interviewed on the subject, Mme. Poincaré said: "There is only one feminist in this house, and it is the premier, not I."

Hugh S. Gibson, United States Minister to Poland, was recently married in Brussels to Miss Ynes Reytiens, the daughter of Major and Mme. Reytiens, of an old Brussels family. Mr. Gibson first met his bride when he was first secretary of the legation in the Belgian capital—a post he held from 1914 to 1916. Mr. Gibson, who was born in Los Angeles about thirty-nine years ago, has seen diplomatic service in Honduras, London, Washington, Havana, Brussels, Paris, and the inter-allied mission to countries of the former Austro-Hungarian Empire. He is the author of "A Journal from Our Legation in Belgium, 1917."

Mr. Thomas Hastings, architect of the New York Public Library, has been selected by the Council of the Royal Institute of British Architects as a fit recipient of the Royal Gold Medal of Architecture for the current year. Mr. Hastings was born in New York in 1860, and is a graduate of the Ecole des Beaux Arts. Since 1884 he has been a partner of the firm of Carrère & Hastings, who were the architects of the National Academy of Design, the Ponce de Léon and Alcazar hotels at St. Augustine, Florida, and many other notable buildings. Mr. Hastings is a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters and president of the Society of Beaux Arts Architects. He is a chevalier of the Legion of Honor, France. He will be remembered by San Franciscans as the designer of the Tower of Jewels at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

Dr. Hubert Work, who took the oath of office as Postmaster-General to succeed Will Hays, hails from Colorado, but was born in Marion Center, Pennsylvania. He took his M. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1885 and began practicing in Greeley, Colorado, in the same year. In 1896 he founded the Woodcraft Hospital for mental and nervous diseases in Pueblo, Colorado. He was a delegate at large to the Republican National Convention in 1908; chairman of the Colorado Republican State Central Committee in 1912; and has been member from Colorado of the Republican National Committee. Dr. Work was a lieutenant-colonel of the M. C., U. S. A., during the war.

The Isles of Greece.

The isles of Greece! the isles of Greece
Where burning Sappho loved and sung,
Where grew the arts of war and peace,
Where Delos rose, and Phœbus sprung!
Eternal summer gilds them yet,
But all, except their sun, is set.

The Scian and the Teian muse,
The hero's harp, the lover's lute,
Have found the fame your shores refuse:
Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds which echo further west
Than your sires' Islands of the Blest.

The mountains look on Marathon—
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone,
I dream'd that Greece might still be free;
For standing on the Persians' grave,
I could not deem myself a slave. . . .

'Tis something in the dearth of fame,
Though link'd among a fetter'd race,
To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffuse my face;
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush—for Greece a tear.

Must we but weep o'er days more blest?
Must we but blush?—Our fathers' blood
Earth! render back from out thy breast
A remnant of our Spartan dead!
Of the three hundred grant but three,
To make a new Thermopylae!

What, silent still! and silent all?
Ah! no;—the voices of the dead
Sound like a distant torrent's fall,
And answer, "Let one living head,
But one, arise,—we come, we come!"
'Tis but the living who are dumb.

In vain—in vain: strike other chords;
Fill high the cup with Samian wine!
Leave battles to the Turkish hordes,
And shed the blood of Scio's vine!
Hark! rising to the ignoble call—
How answers each bold Bacchanal!

You have the Pyrrhic dance as yet;
Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?
Of two such lessons, why forget
The nobler and the manlier one?
You have the letters Cadmus gave—
Think ye he meant them for a slave? . . .

The tyrant of the Chersonese
Was freedom's best and bravest friend;
That tyrant was Miltiades!
O that the present hour would lend
Another despot of the kind!
Such chains as his were sure to bind. . . .

Trust not for freedom to the Franks—
They have a king who buys and sells;
In native swords and native ranks
The only hope of courage dwells:
But Turkish force and Latin fraud
Would break your shield, however broad. . . .

Place me on Sunium's marbled steep,
Where nothing, save the waves and I,
May hear our mutual murmurs sweep;
There, swan-like, let me sing and die:
A land of slaves shall ne'er be mine—
Dash down you cup of Samian wine!

The Houses.

(A SONG OF THE DOMINIONS.)

'Twixt my house and thy house the pathway is broad,
In thy house or my house is half the world's hoard;
By my house and thy house hangs all the world's fate,
On thy house and my house lies half the world's hate.

For my house and thy house no help shall we find Save thy house and my house—kin cleaving to kind:
If my house be taken, thine tumbleth anon,
If thy house be forfeit, mine followeth soon.

'Twixt my house and thy house what talk can there be
Of headship or lordship, or service or fee?
Since my house to thy house no greater can send Than thy house to my house—friend comforting friend;
And thy house to my house no meaner can bring Than my house to thy house—King counseling King.

—Rudyard Kipling.

In nine months up to October, Germany bought $300,476,000 worth of American goods and shipped us only $59,401,000 worth. Where did that trifling difference of about $240,000,000 come from? Who furnished it? Where did they get it? Was it their own money? Or is Germany on the lists for an unlimited charge account?—Capper's Weekly.

THREE GREAT EGOISTS.

Gamaliel Bradford's Gallery Contains Portraits of Whistler, Jefferson, and Adams.

Egoism is not, generally speaking, a characteristic American trait. Conceit, perhaps; but egoism is rarer than its too frequently loose application would imply. It is a subtlety that older nations manifest quite freely among their cultured classes. Though of course it is not necessary to point out to the most ingenuous that there are egoists and egoists. Suffice it to say, without going into a dissertation on the history of the word, that the three examples selected here are of entirely different types. The fact that three out of eight of Mr. Bradford's great Americans qualify for the post of egoism does not mean that Americans are innately egoistic, but that, as has often been stated before, great men are above nationalities. And, too, great men are frequently imbued with a great case of ego.

If the casual reader of American letters and affairs were asked to name the American with the greatest degree of amour propre he would probably answer Jimmie Whistler—that is, if he did not reply "T. R." Whistler is taken as the example par excellence of self-satisfaction, which to most persons' notion is synonymous with egoism. It is only one branch of it. Probably the true answer up to date of the most egotistical American is Henry Adams, and that despite his having been anything but self-complacent. His was the super egoism that rears impatiently at its own vulgarity. His was the art that conceals art. To the uninitiate he might pass as the most modest of men; but who dares add "and the most unassuming"? In fact, beside these two arch examples of the differing poles of egoism it seems poor classification to drag in so natural and normal a conceit as Joseph Jefferson's. But Jefferson represents the native egoism of art and is necessary for the trilogy.

Jefferson is the eldest of our three specimens, but Whistler flags first attention by virtue of his having become an historic figure. He is crystallized as a "character." Readers of the Pennells' life and journals of Whistler know the facts of his life. Mr. Bradford spares us the boredom of repetition. For the benefit of those innocent of acquaintance with the Pennells' weighty tomes he summarizes as follows:

Whistler was born in Lowell, like other great men. He did not like it, would have preferred his mother's Southern dwelling-place, and sometimes implied that he was born in Baltimore. He declared in court that he was born in Saint Petersburg. He once said to an inquisitive model: "My child, I never was born. I came from on high"; and the model answered, with a frivolous impertinence that charmed him, "I should say you came from below." He was as reticent about his age as he was about his birthplace. But the hard fact is that he was born in Lowell in 1834. To be born in Lowell, to grow up in Russia, to be educated at West Point, to paint in France and England, with vague dashes to Venice and Valparaiso, and to die in London at seventy makes a sufficiently variegated career. Even so, it was less variegated without than within.

Mr. Bradford finds the explanation of Whistler's eccentricity and conceit in his explicit candor. Candor is, of course, the mark of the true artist. A statesman can avoid the imputation of egoism, but a true artist, never:

In all these varied phases of simplicity and sophistication what strikes me most is a certain childlikeness. The child is a naked man, and in many respects so was Whistler. The child clue accounts for many of his oddities and reconciles many of his contradictions. He thought some strange things; but above all, he said and did what he thought, as most of us do not. Take his infinite delight in his own work. What artist in any line does not feel it? But some conceal it more than Whistler. Gazing with rapt adoration at one of his pictures, he said to Keppel: "Now, isn't it beautiful?" "It certainly is," said Keppel. And Whistler: "No, but isn't it beautiful?" "It is, indeed," said Keppel. And Whistler again, "raising his voice to a scream, with a not too wicked blasphemy, and bringing his hand down upon his knee with a bang so as to give superlative emphasis to the last word of his sentence, "—it! isn't it beautiful?"

The "child clue," as Mr. Bradford calls his discovery, is really very acute. It accounts for practically everything about Whistler, vanity, fickleness, quarrelsomeness, and particularly the last. But the child clue is really the artist clue:

Moreover, in all his fights and quarrels, he liked and respected—possibly, as Du Maurier insinuates,—a little dreaded—those who stood up to him and answered back. If you dodged and cowered, he would pursue you remorselessly. If you gave him as good as he sent, he would laugh that shrill "Ha! Ha!" and let you go. Mark Twain visited him and was looking over his pictures. "Oh," cried Whistler, "don't touch that! Don't you see, it isn't dry?" "I don't mind," said Mark. "I have gloves on." From that moment they got along famously. When the artist was painting Lady Meux, he vexed and bothered and badgered her past endurance. Finally she snapped out, "See here, Jimmie Whistler! You keep a civil tongue in that head of yours, or I will have in some one to finish those portraits you made of me." All Whistler could find to say was, "How dare you? How dare you?"

He was not, for all his litigation, a logician or a debater. But he was veracious. Only, and this is unchildlike, he could be truthful at his own expense. That was the innate artist in him. We disagree with Mr. Bradford in the following:

The child clue will stay with us, as before. Those who knew Whistler best frequently recur to it: "When off his guard, he was often a pathetic kid" (Alexander Harrison, quoted by Frank Harris in "Contemporary Portraits"). The childlike candor rarely failed, not only in asserting merits, but even in recognizing defects: "He was the most absolutely truthful man about himself that I ever met. I never knew him to hide an opinion or a thought—not to try to excuse an action." And with the candor in professing opinions went a high and energetic courage in defending them, a courage that was sometimes blatant and tactless, but seems to have been genuine, even to the point of admitting his own failures.

With all the weaknesses of childishness, Whistler had one of its strongest points—that of loyal affection to the people for whom he really cared. His rapid-fire friendships were of a different order of things. Few men, artists or other, go on record for filial and marital devotion such as Whistler's. Mr. Bradford neglects to seize this clue as one of the most valuable for his theory:

Two attachments to women, at any rate, played a large part in his career. He adored his mother and obeyed her in his youth. He adored her and watched over her in his riper years. Although he resented any critical suggestion of sentiment in his portrait of her, he confided to a friend, speaking very slowly and softly, "Yes—yes—one does like to make one's mummy just as nice as possible." When he was over fifty, he stumbled upon a marriage, fortuitous as most other external events in his life; but the marriage was singularly happy; he adored his wife as he had his mother, and her death shattered him in a way to confute those who denied him human tenderness.

There is something akin to the genius of Whistler in that of Joe Jefferson. It is the childlike artist quality. But whereas Jefferson was even more naïve and far less sophisticated than Whistler, he was more of a man—perhaps because he was less of an artist. Jefferson's, too, was a more lovable quality of personality. His vanity was spontaneous, but he was fully aware of it:

There is no doubt that he himself felt the charges of repetition and self-assertion, though he could always meet them with his charming humor, as when he tells the story of his friends' giving him a Christmas present of "The Rivals" with all the parts but his own cut out. The cleverest thing he ever said as to the lack of variety was his answer to Matthews, who charged him with making a fortune with one part and a carpet-bag. "It is perhaps better to play one part in different ways than to play many parts all in one way."

His egotism, like Whistler's, was the more manifest because of his sincerity and frankness:

But Jefferson's ample admission of his faults and weaknesses is apparent everywhere and is really charming. He agrees to accept a rôle to please a friend: "I did so, partly to help my old partner, and partly to see my name in large letters. This was the first time I had ever enjoyed that felicity, and it had a most soothing influence upon me." He sees a rival actor and appreciates his excellence, "though I must confess that I had a hard struggle even inwardly to acknowledge it. As I look back and call to mind the slight touch of envy that I felt that night, I am afraid that I had hoped to see something not quite so good, and was a little annoyed to find him such a capital actor." All actors and all men feel these things; not all have the honesty to say them.

Whistler's case exactly. The main difference between the temperaments of these two great exponents of American art was that whereas Jefferson was sincere throughout, Whistler was only really so in his work. The man himself was a poseur, from his assumed foreign birth to his exaggerated cane and cultivated white plume. Jefferson's genius took less the form of make-believe, despite the nature of his art. Where Whistler played at being an eccentric as a small boy plays at pirates Jefferson had a very real taste for childish things:

"At New Orleans," he said to Mr. Wilson, "Eugene Field and I ranged through the curiosity shops, and the man would buy dolls and such things." And Wilson told him that "Field said he never saw a man like Jefferson—that his eye was caught with all sorts of gewgaws, and that he simply squandered money on trifles." And Jefferson chuckled, "That's it: one-half the world thinks the other half crazy."

His taste for toys was the ruling passion of a happy youngster:

With this airy, gracious, fantastic temper Jefferson had always something in common, however practical he might be when a compelling occasion called for it. He loved dolls, and toyshops, would spend hours in them, watching the children and entering into their ecstasies. He would stand before the windows and put chatter into the dolls' mouths.

Like Whistler, he adored his family and was gentle with inferiors:

Irregularities in conduct and irregularities in artistic method he would not tolerate. But he was reasonable in discipline, and he was gentle, as gentle, we are told, with his subordinates as with his children and grandchildren. In strong contrast to actors like Macready and Forrest, he had the largest patience in meeting unexpected difficulties. One night the curtain dropped in the midst of a critical scene. Jefferson accepted the situation with perfect calmness. Afterwards he inquired the cause of the trouble, and one of the stage hands explained that he had leaned against the button that gave the signal. "Well," said Jefferson, "will you kindly find some other place to lean tomorrow night?"

It is interesting to note that the one point—and the only one—of contact that the super-egoist, Henry Adams, has with our other two specimens is that of a great admiration for women:

With women he fared somewhat better than with men, and few men have been more frank about acknowledging their debt to the other sex. "In after life he made a general law of experience—no woman had ever driven him wrong; no man had ever driven him right." And at all times and on all occasions he paid his debt with abundance of praise, tempered, of course, with such reserve as was to be expected from one who had all his life been seeking education and had not found it. To be sure, he readily admits entire ignorance as to the character, motives, and purposes of woman-kind. "The study of history is useful to the historian by teaching him his ignorance of women; and the mass of this ignorance crushes one who is familiar enough with what are called historical sources to realize how few women have ever been known." But such admission of ignorance, especially for one who triumphed in ignorance on all subjects, only made it easier to recognize and celebrate the charm.

Aside from this gentle phase of his nature, his is a totally different temperament and the least American of the three. There was something in him foreign even to Anglo-Saxon genius. Spiritually he belonged to a far older race than either:

"For him, only the Greek, the Italian, or the French standards had claims to respect, and the barbarism of Shakespeare was as flagrant as to Voltaire; but his theory never affected his practice. . . . he read his Shakespeare as the Evangel of conservative Christian anarchy, neither very conservative nor very Christian, but stupendously anarchistic." But tried by the one final, ever-repeated test, all that art offers is about as unsatisfactory as American politics or tropical dreams. "Art was a superb field for education, but at every turn he met the same old figure, like a battered and illegible signpost that ought to direct him to the next station, but never did."

There is something rather Eastern in his colossal diffidence to life and his impatience at its limitations. All the world knows of his disconsolate search for an education. The best the world had to offer was not good enough for Henry Adams:

It is hardly necessary to say that, with this restless and unsatisfied spirit the period which sees education finished for most men did not even see it begun. The infant who starts with the definition of a teacher as "a man employed to tell lies to little boys" is not very likely to get large results from early schooling. The juvenile Adams surveyed Boston and Quincy and found them distinctly wanting, in his eyes, though not in their own. "Boston had solved the universe; or had offered and realized the best solution yet tried. The problem was worked out." But not for him.

The redeeming quality of Adams' incessant demand for more education is that it was sincerely the most pressing fact of his existence. A vainer man would have felt that though others got little from school and college, he at least must get more. On the contrary Adams ranked himself on a plane with his fellows. His discontent was actually partially for them. He admitted many of them his superiors:

"Harvard College was a good school, but at bottom what the boy disliked most was any school at all. He did not want to be one in a hundred—one per cent. of an education." Furthermore, with the willingness we all have to acknowledge weaknesses we should not wish others to find in us, he declares that "he had not wit or scope or force. Judges always ranked him beneath a rival, if he had any; and he believed the judges were right."

When a man admits that his brain power is not of the highest and yet demands the best there is and is discontented with that, he is either remarkably self-centred or remarkably altruistic. If the latter, then his incessant demands for something better than the best were simply what he felt all men entitled to. It is just possible that Adams himself never analyzed this phase of his extraordinary case. Analysis was not his strong point. He does not even clearly define the fetich, education. But there is something pervading the Henry Adams atmosphere that inclines one to accept the former alternative. If he were concerned at all with the rest of humanity it was as an abstract extension of the ego with which he was so perpetually involved:

"All that Henry Adams ever saw in man was a reflection of his own ignorance." The great obstacle for sensitive natures to all social pleasure, the immense intrusion of one's self, was always present to him, never entirely got rid of. "His little mistakes in etiquette or address made him writhe with torture." And of one concrete, tormenting incident he says, "This might seem humorous to some, but to him the world turned ashes." The annoyances were great and the compensations trifling.

And not only did Boston fail him. All the rest of the world was equally tried and found wanting:

The truth is, that in this infinitely reiterated demand for education there is something too much of the egotism which Henry Adams inherited from his distinguished great-grandfather and which had not been altogether dissipated by the intermixture of two generations of differing blood, it being always recognized that egotism is perfectly compatible with shyness, reserve, and even self-effacement. In the preface to his autobiography Adams points out that the great lesson of Rousseau to the autobiographer was to beware of the Ego. In consequence Adams himself conscientiously avoids the pronoun "I" and writes of his efforts and failures in the third person. As a result it appears to me that the impression of egotism is much increased. We are all accustomed to the harmless habit of the "I"; but to have Henry Adams constantly obtruding Henry Adams produces a singular and in the end singularly exasperating effect.

It is amusing that it was precisely Whistler's vain-glorious use of the third person singular that had such a mordant effect on his enemies and critics. The use of his own proper name to avoid the appearance of egoism is probably the only public naïveté that Adams was ever guilty of.

Mr. Bradford is more discursive of Henry Adams' life, since every one is not familiar with the details, despite or because of the formidable "Education of Henry Adams." The summary is very interesting in this telescopic form, as even a careful reading of the autobiography leaves one in a rather dazed than illuminated state.

In fact, "American Portraits" serves the admirable purpose of lighting up a number of bright, particular, American lives. The book is the first of a series in which the author hopes to cover American history, progressing backwards to the seventeenth century.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending March 18, 1922, were $144,700,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $150,500,000; a decrease of $5,800,000.

There has been a quickened interest in the steel trade, though it has not resulted in any material change in prices. Buying has been stimulated by the approach of spring, and seasonal improvement will be under way in the near future.

Preparations for the resumption of copper mining here and there are going on, notbe well enough not to follow advances too far.

Cotton seems pretty good value at current market prices, and it would not require much in the way of export demands or the breaking up of the textile strike in New England and resumption of buying by the mills to bring about a decided rise in this staple. At the same time the mills have a considerable surplus on hand and continue to report rather cautious buying on the part of their customers. Meantime, one may expect rather unimportant speculation in the cotton market.

The stock market from time to time gives evidence of very good selling having been consummated in many leading stocks, and it is apparent at times that conservative interests are not favorable to any excessive speculation at present. The situation at Washington is complicated. The Administration is one that is very pleasing in the main to all business interests. It may be merely "good politics" on the part of those in power at Washington to help business, but, whatever the reason, certainly there have come from the Administration more real notes of encouragement in a month than had come in some former periods in a year.

The one thing that is particularly bothering business sentiment just now is the bonus question. Business can not understand how members of Congress can shut their eyes to the warnings that have been so plainly indicated by leading financial authorities, not only in the government, but throughout the nation, and go on bull-headedly in what would seem to be the pursuit of political profits by way of appeasing a certain element of their constituencies. It must make at least a very large minority of the veterans of the last war blush a bit when they see their legion's chieftain brandishing a club in the face of the President.

It would seem almost impossible of conception that any well-minded publicist would take advantage of this general situation to attempt to feather his own political nest or to increase his own business interests. And yet that is exactly what it would seem a certain "american" is doing day after day in a brazen effort to browbeat the opponents of the bonus measure at Washington into some action inspired by fear rather than conscience.

It is strange also that even some very hard-headed financial interests seem to think that a bonus via the sales tax would be negligible so far as the prosperity of the country is concerned. It is impossible to see but that a tax is a tax, and that if the government raises a few million dollars or a few billions, the money has to come from somewhere and will be a definite and positive burden upon the general public.

The stock market, of course, reflects in a surface way for the most part, and it remains to be seen what would really happen if the bonus plan should be made into law.

Meantime, labor promises to cut up some high jinks in the coal fields and hopes to enlist the aid of the railway unions to win continuance of practically war-time conditions; while the railway wages problem itself is still to be settled. And tax day approaches.

Despite the fact that many annual reports coming to hand now are showing large deficits, and for some companies the turn in the road seems far away even yet, and despite, also, the very rotten situation that has long existed and results of which are just now developing in connection with "bucketteering," there is an undercurrent of real optimism, helped, no doubt, to a large extent by the better grain prices and the consequent assistance to the agricultural element.

Among some low-priced railroads and among a great many public utilities there are still bargains to be found. Among the public utilities one of the big opportunities is the Market Street Railway issues. Last week the senior issue went on a dividend basis, marking one of the final steps in the culmination of over fifteen years of efforts in upbuilding the transportation system of San Francisco after the prostration of the city by fire.—The Trader.

The problem of Europe's indebtedness to the United States will be a live issue for many years to come, the National Bank of Commerce in New York believes. Because of the present world-wide business depression, the confusion in international trade, and the financial difficulties of a number of the nations of Europe, refunding legislation does not settle the large question of international obligations, the bank says in the March number of its magazine, Commerce Monthly.

"Foreign governments owe to the United States approximately $11,000,000,000, largely payable on demand," it adds. "On February 9th the President signed a bill creating a commission to arrange the refunding of these obligations. The commission is specifically empowered within three years to refund and extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest of any obligations of any foreign government arising out of the world war, now held or hereafter acquired by the United States. The converted obligations may not have a maturity beyond June 15, 1947, or an interest rate of less than 4½ per cent. Authority to cancel any part of the indebtedness or to substitute the obligations of one country for another is specifically withheld from the commission by the terms of the act.

"It seems reasonable to predict that the commission will extend as lenient terms to our former allies in the matter of refunding these debts as are possible under the terms of the present legislation. In the country at large there are two well-defined opinions as to the question of ultimate payment—one for and one against the full cancellation of the debts.

"The case for cancellation was well stated in a recent address by Mr. Justice Clarke of the United States Supreme Court. The arguments run that for three years the Allies fought the Central Powers without our assistance. Our advances went to further the common victory and were nothing less than our share in the war, so that in equity there really is nothing owing us.

"But assuming that the Allies can pay—so runs the argument—may it not be a question whether it is to our best interest that they do so? It is not necessary to demonstrate that our debtors must meet both the yearly interest payments and amortizations chiefly by sending goods—manufactured goods—into this country. The annual interest alone on our foreign credits at 4½ per cent. comes to a round half-billion dollars. Our favorable trade balance of last year was about $2,000,000,000. If our allies are able to meet their interest obligations, our trade balance will probably show a rapid readjustment during the next few years. The balance may shift to a so-called favorable one, with imports exceeding exports conceivably by as much as a half-billion dollars. Such a sudden readjustment, such an influx of manufactured goods from abroad, would possibly entail serious consequences, prolonging for a long period unsatisfactory business conditions. If, however, our investors should purchase foreign securities on a large scale, readjustment may be partially arrested. Such are the main points of this phase of the case.

"One of the most forceful of the arguments of the pro-cancellation forces is only incidentally moral or economic. They hold that if we press for the collection of these advances we shall in the years to come gain the reputation of being the Shylock of international finance. They point to history to demonstrate that the repayment of huge international debts, whether tribute or borrowings, usually breeds a spirit of mutual distrust, suspicion, and ultimate hatred between the parties involved. And they raise the question whether for a nation with a large foreign trade the possibility of such an outcome is worth the candle.

"Those who wish to see our loans collected in full present counter arguments. They hold that the war was primarily the war of Europe, precipitated by European imperialism, to which her opponents contributed as well as Germany. Our sole interest was to insure the defeat of Germany, so that in future years we should not have to oppose her alone. We asked no assistance in maintaining our armies in the line; the funds borrowed from us by our allies to maintain their armies are their just and due obligations; and they should expect to repay them. The cancellation of international obligations is a dangerous precedent to establish. Furthermore, the spoils of war in the shape of land acquisition and reparations in kind and money have gone entirely to others; we asked nothing in this connection.

"On the economic side of the question the opponents of cancellation maintain that if our government can collect from its debtors yearly interest of a half-billion dollars or more, our taxes can be commensurably cut down. Lightened taxation is in turn expected to give a decided impetus to business revival. However opinions may differ as to the positive influence of taxation upon business activity, all sides will agree that taxation is at the present time absorbing a larger share of the national income than is desirable.

"In any case it is certain that this refunding legislation does not settle the large question of international indebtedness. The present world-wide business depression, the confusion in international trade, and the financial difficulties of a number of the nations of Europe will make the problem of external national debts and consequently the general question of the adjustment of accounts between the nations live issues for many years to come."

Uncertainty as to bonus legislation is now the dominating factor in the bond market and an important adverse factor in business, says the National Bank of Commerce in New York. The possibility of large additional government flotations instead of reduction of the public debt has unquestionably resulted in hesitation in the market for bonds. Estimates of the final cost of the bonus vary from $1,590,000,000 to sums hugely in excess of this. The

Plans to meet bonus requirements by taxes would perhaps be free from some of the ill effects of a large bond issue, but in the long run it seems likely that the result would be equally as bad on business. In some quarters the belief has apparently gained ground that the expenditure of bonus payments by the who served in the world war. These men are now the most productive part of the population of the country. They are just entering upon that period of life when responsibility for the nation's business is being gradually transferred to their shoulders. The best that could happen would be for each man, by his own efforts, to pay his own bonus. In practice, however, the result will be quite otherwise, the capable and thrifty being obliged ultimately to provide, not only for the payment of whatever bonus they may receive, but also for the payment of bonuses to their less capable and less industrious fellows.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $60,000 Southern Boulevard District, Lassen County, California, gold 6 per cent. bonds, due serially, to yield 5.60 per cent., tax exempt.

Southern Boulevard District includes the city of Susanville, the county seat, and about 1620 square miles—the southern half of Lassen County. A large part of the district is devoted to general farming and stock raising. About 25,000 acres are being put under irrigation, greatly increasing their productivity and value. The district also includes valuable tracts of timber.

Government ownership and operation of electric light and power utilities, as exemplified by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, is not a success, from the viewpoint of either service or low cost, as compared to privately-owned and publicly-regulated electric light and power companies in the United States and Canada, according to a report made to the National Electric Light Association by the engineering firm of Murray & Flood of New York City.

The investigation was made for the purpose of obtaining complete economic data from which to draw a comparison between governmentally-owned and privately-owned utilities. This led to a consideration of the political and economic structure of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, which operates the largest government-owned system in existence, and to a comparison between that system and others privately owned and operated, but subject to public regulation, both in the United States and Canada.

In summarizing the results of the investigation the report asserts that no system of electric service such as that operated by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario is applicable in the United States. It shows that the service rendered by privately-owned utilities under public regulation is cheaper and better than that rendered by governmentally-owned utilities, and that even in Ontario, which has what is generally looked upon as the most successful example of government-owned utilities, private capital and enterprise have contributed more to the upbuilding of civic, industrial, and commercial life than has the government-owned project.

In Quebec, the report states that privately-owned electric light and power companies serve the people of that province at a cost of 32 per cent., or approximately one-third less than the cost of similar service to residents of Ontario, and that the cost in Quebec is 27 per cent. less than to even those consumers residing in the Canadian-Niagara district. In addition, private companies in Quebec deliver 84 per cent. more energy per capita than does the Hydro-Electric Power Commission to its customers in Ontario, while the generating capacity available for Quebec is 89 per cent. greater than that available upon the lines of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission in Ontario.

In this connection the report states that privately-owned and operated companies in every case are delivering power to their customers at a considerably lower average cost per k.w.h. than in the case of government electric utilities, and that the number of k.w.h. generated per capita served is greater.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Much has been written and said about the reaction of the war on fiction. Some prophets maintained that the effect would be a swing towards realism; others, towards romanticism. As there have been probably as many reactions as there are novel readers, and certainly many more than there are novelists to record the phenomenon, it is not strange that post-war fiction is of a strangely variegated pattern. One of the most delightful phases it presents is the novel of childhood. Along with our satiation of war, tragedy, romance is a closely related satiation of ourselves. And as we must have human interest we turn with relief to the novel of childhood. Two charming and totally different ones were brought out in the past week—one by the publisher of "Moon-Calf," a fact mentioned to emphasize Mr. Knopf's versatility. This is "Explorers of the Dawn," by Mazo de la Roche, a young Canadian novelist. The other book, published by Macmillan, is "Humbug," by E. M. Delafield. The latter is labeled "a study in education"; the former is serenely guiltless of a theme.

Christopher Morley, who writes the introduction to "Explorers of the Dawn," and to whom we are evidently indebted for its present publication, says, "Of course, this is not one of those books that 'everybody must read.'" Perhaps not. The very young themselves might not enjoy it despite its reeking of youth, real youth, not the tawdry thing of the teens and twenties that twenty-four novels out of twenty-five stuff us with. The traditional man from Mars judging our world from its supposed mirror, the novel, would conclude that we sprang into existence aged seventeen—with a few rare exceptions the youngest age that figures in fiction—and abruptly passed into a limbo of non-existence aged thirty-three. The latter is even a liberal statement, for except one or two heroines of Thackeray and De Morgan, I doubt if a heroine is ever really over thirty. But to return to the pristine glory of the "Explorers of the Dawn"—its hero, for certainly the Seraph is its hero, progresses from four or thereabouts to the neighborhood of six. And whether or not every one should read this delectable book, certainly the Seraph should become a household allusion wherever English is understood or five-year-old boys flourish. Angel, due to the fact that he is four years the Seraph's senior, is much less interesting. His is a charming portrait, but one does not gloat over him, and gloat is the only adequate expression for one's attitude toward the Seraph. Mr. Morley carefully refrained from quoting, for altruistic fear of spoiling the reader's pleasure. And it is a thing not to be lightly disregarded. But it is nevertheless with sheer will power that one restrains oneself from quoting the Seraph here, and it is safe to say that he will be very widely quoted in the future.

"Humbug," also a study of child life quite as much as a study of education, is a very different thing. Where Miss de la Roche's epic of infancy seems to take root and grow from its own lyric buoyancy, Miss Delafield's story of a childhood has all the earmarks of careful workmanship. It is much better craft than the "Explorers of the Dawn," whose string of charming coincidences finally partakes of a delicate burlesque, but it is lesser art. "Humbug" is the story of two little girls, a fact that perhaps accounts for its being a tragedy while its joyous contemporary history of three boys could be prescribed as an antidote to melancholia. And yet these two books have startling analogies. Both are among the most faithful portraits of children in English literature. There are pages of "Humbug" descriptive of poor Vonnie's sufferings that are calculated to draw tears from a Prussian officer. The careful psychological study of Lily's reaction to her parents' well-meant cruelties will touch the bell of recognition in any one who has ever known intimately a conventional Victorian household. The effect on Lily of her wrong-headed training is traced to early maturity. "Explorers of the Dawn," also indirectly a study of education—are not Mrs. Handsomebody's tuition and persecution the mainsprings of the plot?—stops short at the respective ages of six, nine, and ten of its three youthful swashbucklers. Omitting John and Angel, who are charming persons, but still not forgettable, and reserving the Seraph for a place we are sure his coquettish little heart would have thrilled at, beside Lily, and we have surely two of the most lifelike portraits and—to use a word the newspaper have rapidly popularized to triteness—two of the most appealing figures one is apt to meet between the covers of books.

Further manifestation that the novel of extreme youth is a definite phase of our present psychology is Edwin Björkman's "The Soul of a Child," the history of a boy from five to fifteen. Not having read Mr. Björkman's novel, his first incidentally, I mention it here only for the significance of its theme. Like "Explorers of the Dawn," it is published by Mr. Knopf. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

A new novel, "Double-Crossed," by W. Douglas Newton, the author of "Low Ceilings," is announced. D. Appleton & Co. are the publishers.

When A. S. M. Hutchinson met Sinclair Lewis recently in London he had to own up that he had not read "Main Street." Lewis, however, was able to retaliate by stating that the perusal of "If Winter Comes" was a pleasure still in store for him. Once this confession was out of the way they became good friends.

Houdini's forthcoming book, which E. P. Dutton & Co. have promised for March publication under the title of "Paper Tricks," has had its title changed and will be called instead "Paper Magic." It will be, according to the announcement, of particular interest to amateurs in parlor amusements and to organizers of all manner of social entertainment, for it will explain how to do many kinds of sleight-of-hand tricks and produce many puzzling illusions—all that brood of magic stunts that seem to belie possibility and are always interesting.

Annie Fellows Johnston has recently sent to her publishers (Page, Boston) the manuscript of a new Little Colonel book—"The Road of the Loving Heart," an allegory, which will appear in book form next summer.

Have you ever racked your brains for the translation of a mile of letters placed after a prominent man's name? If you have you will enjoy the story told by Charles Hitchcock Sherrill in his "Prime Ministers and Presidents" (Doran). Sir George Reid, the former Australian prime minister, has been made Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George, and he was quick to sense the bitter feeling aroused. Upon being asked by an opposition newspaper man what the initials K. C. M. G. meant, he replied: "It only means—Keep Calling Me George."

A volume of prose by Tagore is being brought out by the Macmillan Company under the title "Creative Unity." The chapters focus on the theme of the unity of life, but they cover a wide range of subjects, from "The Poet's Religion," with its striking comparison between some of the great poets of England and of India, to a discussion of the evils of a narrow nationalism, and of woman and the home in the West and in the East. There is a resemblance in these essays to the best work of Emerson, both in loftiness of purpose and in distinction and lucidity of style.

Since the typewriter has done away with the hand-written manuscript and collectors find it increasingly difficult to secure manuscripts of modern authors, galley proof corrected by the author has acquired a high value. In recent sales at the American Art Galleries corrected galley proof of Kipling's stories published in the Ladies' Home Journal brought high prices. The first corrected galley of "Wieland's Sword," with many changes and corrections in Kipling's hand, fetched $320; "Young Men at the Manor," first corrected proof, $360; second corrected proof, $210. The first corrected proof of "The Knights of the Joyous Venture" brought $340 and the same price was paid for the first corrected galley proof of "Old Men at Pevensy."

The Duttons announce for early publication the fourth and final volume of the series of "The Social Plays of Arthur Wing Pinero," which Clayton Hamilton has edited, with introductions and critical and biographical comment. The forthcoming volume will contain the two plays, "Mid-Channel" and "The Thunderbolt."

John Drew's reminiscences of his long and varied experience, covering half a century as an actor, will be published somewhat later this spring by E. P. Dutton & Co. under the title, "My Years on the Stage." The work promises to be a valuable contribution to the

By Henry Sydnor Harrison

"I knew the furnace was out—
I felt the house grow cold—
And still I couldn't leave that book"

So wrote one of the first readers of this new novel by the author of "Queed." And it's a feeling that will be shared by thousands of Americans who will be held spellbound as the story marches to its magnificent climax. $2.00.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Rahab.

"Rahab," by Waldo Frank, is a book that defies classification, but reminds one both in its incoherency and horridness of a nightmare. Incidentally it should have been called "The Degraded in Spite of Herself." If the foregoing seems a bit strong one can only say that it would be superfluous to mince matters in reviewing a book where they are so wholly unminced. Mr. Frank's chief qualification for publicity—and he will undoubtedly receive some for "Rahab"—is his perfect simplicity in calling a spade a spade. Throughout the choppy, rather inchoate and discursive narrative no possible opportunity is lost to call things by their right names.

Candor is a very good thing, but one wonders sickly, after a hasty and disgusted perusal of "Rahab," whether even candor can not be grossly overdone. Writers of Mr. Frank's obvious morbidity should be either criminologists, when they could wallow contentedly in the subject that most interests them, or else they should have psychopathic treatment. At least they should not be allowed to break out in print. It is bad for them and is as bad as the sensational newspaper or movie for the public. "Rahab" is completely obsessed by one idea, and since we are following Mr. Frank's example of plain speaking that idea is sensuality.

Young writers, and one knows Mr. Frank is young by his absorption in his candid subject, have an idea that the more lurid they are the more lifelike, in short the more Balzacian. Nothing is more mistaken. Balzac is a great portraitist, not a priest performing morbid rites. And granted that Mr. Waldo's theme really is of interest to people like himself, even they should be protected from their own obsession in such matters. It is only so much the worse that the writer's earthy theme is thinly veneered with a pseudo-spiritual one. Two wrongs do not make a right. Neither does one find God through the ministrations of either the flesh or the devil. And the present reviewer doubts very much whether Fanny found holiness in the underworld. It is the one place where the author slipped in his realistic nomenclature. Not holiness, Mr. Frank, but resignation. And one can be resigned to anything—even to a modern novel that has not the redeeming feature of Rabelaisian wit.

RAHAB. By Waldo Frank. New York: Boni & Liveright; $2.

The World Book.

The editors of "The World Book" claim that it has been planned somewhat differently from the older encyclopedias. Technical terms, for instance, have been sparingly employed, as many readers are only further confused by them. All long articles have been presented under sub-heads, and in many of them an outline of points is given for the guidance of the reader.

Extensive use has been made of cross references and lists of related topics, so that the reader in the study of any subject can quickly turn to all the articles that relate to it. Departmental and general indexes enable the reader to locate any subject in which he is interested without loss of time. The correct pronunciation of all unusual or difficult terms is given.

The profusion of its illustrations is not the least of this work's attractions. Over 5000 pictures appear in its 6528 pages, and there are many diagrams and sketches. Most of the illustrations are like those in a dictionary, just large enough to help in elucidating the text, but there are hundreds of pictures, sketches, and maps, two-page, one-page, and half-page, many of them colored. Animal and plant life, historical events, geographical topics, and scientific subjects are copiously represented. Certainly, on the pictorial side, the publishers have given a generous measure.

The ten volumes are well bound and admirably printed, and each page lies flat when it is turned. It contains every evidence of care and reliability, and vies with the famous standard encyclopedias in the range of topics. It can be recommended sincerely to the public.

The Spirit of the Common Law.

"The Spirit of the Common Law," by Roscoe Pound, is one of the admirable series of Dartmouth alumni lectureships. The author who is Carter professor of jurisprudence in Harvard University, has long made a special study of the history and philosophy of the common law; and although many of his papers on that subject have been published, the present volume is probably the first adequate, modern summarization of the legal tradition of the Anglo-American races. "The Spirit of the Common Law" is not a technical treatise, and though these lectures were originally delivered before law students and bar associations, their present form is perfectly intelligible to any layman interested enough to read a book on the common law. Some chapter headings are: "Puritanism and the Law," "The Pioneers and the Law," "The Philosophy of Law in the Nineteenth Century," and "Legal Reason." These lectures may be read as separate entities.

An Outline of English Literature.

A book that makes an excellent guide in the study of English literature is an "Outline History of English and American Literature." It will make a handy reference book for the general reader who has not ready access to more exhaustive histories of literature, and it may be used as a supplementary text in English classes as a guide to more extensive reading. Its recommendations are its compactness and its simplicity. It is not a book for the scholar, but rather for the young student or the average reader of English literature.

A Reuter message from Christiania says that a Moscow wireless states that the bodies of Tessem and Knudsen, who left Captain Amundsen's expedition in October, 1918, have now been found by a Russian expedition prospecting for coal near the mouth of the Yenisei. Captain Otto Sverdrup states that the leader of the Norwegian expedition which searched unsuccessfully for the two missing explorers had made an agreement with the Russian expedition in question that the latter body should assist with the search. Captain Sverdrup believes that the bodies were probably found near Cape Wild, where he had made a depot in 1915, and he supposed that Tessem and Knudsen were looking for this depot, which may have been destroyed through lack of protection, when they lost their lives.

The Circus Maximus would accommodate 380,000 spectators.

THE SEQUOIA LITTLE THEATRE.

The March programme for this little playhouse shows an unmistakable advance in merit over the previous performances. Miss Ruth Brenner contrived to assemble a really talented group, including young aspirants and several players of considerable experience who have been professionals and feel an artistic sympathy with her desire to give local talent a good working opportunity.

August Strindberg's one-act curio, "The Stronger," was done with professional poise by Mrs. Prosper Reiter and Miss Peggy Schafer, the handsome, somewhat exotic, and plastic features of the latter young lady fitting with remarkable suitability into what one conceives might be the dramatist's idea of Mlle. Y. Mrs. Reiter played, with an attractive touch of foreignness and with appropriate mobility of mood, the rôle of the wife, and Ruth Brenner gave a touch of the bizarre to the setting.

Pretty Peggy Schafer, with her mobile countenance that can enable its owner to look both mediæval and modern, has unmistakable talent, for she gave the appropriate touch of fascination and mystery to the silent woman whose face said so much.

"The Mourner," a somewhat mortuary sketch by Gay Lombard, may be said to be another curio. It was well done by the three players, Clarise Russell, Basil Sarasin—only a servant, but doing his small bit with judgment—and Esther Jarrett. The latter young lady, who has had some experience in musical comedy, nevertheless wept out the grief of the unknown mourner as heartily as Carolyn Green laughed at the Players Theatre in "The Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The young lady did her part well, but a dramatic sketch that is largely taken up with a burst of sorrowful weeping for a dead man fortunately invisible in an adjoining room, and that culminates in a prayer—audiences don't like prayers—does not very successfully commend itself.

"Violet Souls," a satire by John Jex, will please husbands because it shows up a frivolous wife very much in the wrong and properly castigated by a hitherto too submissive husband. We saw the play some years ago at the Players when William S. Rainey read the author's comments out in front; rather a neat satirical touch that was omitted at the Sequoia. This play was also well acted by Myrtle Blake, Edwin Anton, Walter Goldberg, and Mary Chambers; the latter young lady making her first public appearance, and doing it creditably.

"Forgotten Souls," a drama from the Yiddish by David Pinski, was played by people of professional experience, which accounts for the surprise felt by many in the audience at the really moving acting of Max Newman and Mrs. Willard Moore. The play has beauty of motive, and the two "forgotten souls" were so sympathetically rendered by Mrs. Moore and Mr. Newman that real pathos—that supreme aim in plays of this type—was responded to by the moved spectators.

During the month of April and May Miss Brenner will select the choicest examples from the programmes already given, and play to order before club organizations and the like.

THE ORPHEUM.

The headliner this week is Mrs. Sydney Drew, with Thomas J. Carrigan, in a comedy sketch called "Predestination." That foolish old idea that nobody is missed when they drop out is all nonsense. Everybody worth while is missed, and the Sydney Drews have been very definitely missed from vaudeville programmes. We are uncommonly glad to have Mrs. Drew back again. It is not surprising that after her widowhood she retired temporarily from the line of work so closely associated with the memory of her husband. But having her back again makes us pray that she will stay, for vaudeville sketches in which we see actors and acting have been considerably rarer than they used to be.

Into her work in "Predestination" Mrs. Drew introduced those neat shadings of stress and comedy significations that caused us immediately to enjoy the sensation of seeing real acting. Besides, the lady has a most attractive personality, her appearance pleases, since it also is attractive and unspoiled by any attempts at achieving girlishness, and she is handsomely gowned.

The sketch gave her ample opportunity for delicate conveyances of wifely sarcasm, and the dialogue and plot are alike clever; in, of course, a superficial way, as is exacted in vaudeville. Mrs. Drew has very good support, and "Predestination" neatly hit off the taste of the confirmed vaudevillians.

Next in merit comes "The Mutual Man," the Hal Skelley act, with fetching little Ina Williams as a miniature main support, and two dresy pretties, Eunice Sauvain and Ida Kashner, furnishing the dancing girl element. Hal Skelley and Ina Williams suggest that ancient quibble, the long and the short of it.

They are well matched except for size; both full of zip, whirlwinds of energy, Ina like a dancing, leaping, resilient, little gray terrier, Hal Skelley a long-legged epitome of physical and mental humor. So many unexpected comicallities whirl to the fore in "The Mutual Man" that it is impossible to describe it. But the Skelley-Williams turn made an extremely large-sized success and left the audience clamoring for more. The piece is handsomely mounted, and is so full of the elements of success that it is probably destined to be featured on a high-salaried basis in one of the "revues" which have now become too numerous to mention specifically.

Ruby Norton is an enticing little blonde who can dance and sing with lots of dash, and who knows how to costume herself effectively. She has a good piano accompanist.

In contrast to her is the Lois Bennett act, Miss Bennett being a sweet and pretty warbler, but of the linnet type. How this little woodbird—for there is not the least suggestion of New York about her—could perpetrate that falling-off pink gown is a facer. What geese girls are! That girl never guessed that she didn't have the figure for the lavish display she made, that the gown gave us the fidgets, and that its perilous poise was totally unsuited to her fresh, wholesome, attractive personality.

Pinto and Boyle and the Deans supplied the fill-in element, Raymond Wilbert gave a remarkable exhibition of unusually clever juggling, and the programme ended with the Weston display of living statuary; hackneyed, perhaps, but always striking and beautiful, and, I think, always enjoyed by the spectators.

READINGS AND IMPERSONATIONS.

Although this is an epoch in which the taste for drama seems practically universal, the very children itching to act, and doing so with amazing skill and address when they are properly trained, there are quantities of people that greatly enjoy readings and impersonations. I noticed at the Sydney Hoben opera summaries with how childlike a mental attitude the listeners were absorbed in listening to the story. At the Paul Elder gallery this week Frank C. Thompson, "the man with many voices," amused and entertained both the rising and the risen generation by recitations from Dickens, Shakespeare, Kipling, and Stevenson. Sophisticated audiences—of women, particularly—were enraptured with Dorothea Spinney's recitations of ancient Greek plays, and at the Salon Français recently Mlle. Claire Werleman delighted an audience that understood French by the various changes of mood so enchantingly expressed by the deux; pathos that moistened the listener's eyes in Coppée's "L'Epave," nobility and an elfin enchantment in the two Leconte de Lisle poems, a young girl's plasticity of mood in Coudin's "Oh! Monsieur," and delightfully varied characterizations in the three La Fontaine fables.

In the East, where the population of amusement seekers is so dense, people who have a genuine talent for this sort of thing can make a good living by carrying their one programme from place to place. Ruth Draper, for instance, whom San Franciscans will remember for her excellent character sketches, has "arrived" in New York. She writes her own sketches, is the only one on her programme, and this winter has been filling houses nightly at a very smart figure for seats and has entirely cut out her Pacific Coast itinerary.

Mrs. Henry Lund, Jr., of San Francisco, an impersonator of local prominence, during a winter's stay in New York, when she gave several recitals, including impersonations of prominent actresses, had the opportunity to discover by personal experience how eagerly receptive are Eastern audiences to this line of entertainment, and, in spite of New York's liberal array of theatrical attractions, how ready are the most fashionable and sophisticated classes there in their enjoyment and appreciation of this sort of stage work.

And in vaudeville houses one may notice the same attitude on the part of auditors. It is, of course, a form of theatrical entertainment, the listeners feeling as if they were hearing tiny miniatures of the drama, which offers supreme pleasure to the twentieth-century humanity that is so eager to get away from itself.

THE MERO-FANNING RECITAL.

The double magnet of Yolanda Mero and Cecil Fanning drew to the St. Francis ballroom last Monday afternoon a large audience of fashionables who most enthusiastically set the seal of their approval on the quality of the offering.

Mme. Mero, the Hungarian pianist, revealed herself as an unexceptionable artist, at once solid and brilliant in her attainments. The mere movements of her hands and arms inspired confidence, so graceful and easy were they, while showing a man's strength in the fortissimo passages. The pianist played a Chopin group first, and her versatility speedily became apparent. From the thunders of emotional tempests she offered the contrast of moods of witchery and joy delicately caressed from the keys.

Although her second group of numbers was less interesting, she gave such a masterly interpretation of the Liszt Second Rhapsodie, which was her final number, that she had some difficulty in escaping from the plaudits of the now thoroughly aroused audience. All told, the player yielded four or five encores to the overwhelming demand.

Cecil Fanning, the young baritone whom we first heard at Festival Hall during the Exposition, has a fine, ringing organ, rather low in range, but telling in general effect. Like David Bispham of the past, and Reinhold Werrenrath of the present, Mr. Fanning makes a point of so balancing the words with the music that the sentiment is fully conveyed. It amounts, in fact, to a combination of music and elocution. Those who have heard Werrenrath sing the ballad of "Lochinvar" will see the application.

Mr. Fanning thus dramatizes his numbers, which, generally speaking, are selected for their suitability to this form of art. Schubert's beautiful song, "The Wanderer," supplied an instance of pathos, "Left" of satiric humor, and "The Song of the Dagger" of intense drama, although De Grassi's composition is lacking in musical appeal. A very enjoyable instance of Mr. Fanning's specialty was the old poem, "The Last Leaf," with a simple but expressive musical setting, which was given as an encore.

Mr. Fanning closed his contribution to the recital with Loewe's "Archibald Douglas," an interesting example of old-fashioned balladry.

The young baritone displayed the acquired flexibility of a rather heavy voice in two numbers, one from Schubert, the other from Schumann, but dramatic song is his forte. His voice is a resounding one; so much so

THE MASTER PIANIST.

Godowsky, the superman among pianists as he is often called, is among us, and students of the piano turned out with the greatest anticipation at his Tuesday night recital.

They were not disappointed. This artist, who has been associated with many great musicians only eventually to become his own teacher, has a supreme knowledge of the technique of his art. He amazed by the variety of his tone color, by the perfection of his runs, by the artistic serenity with which he holds himself in reserve while kindling emotions in others, and by the noble beauty of his tone. One feels that the pianist we admired yesterday should today bend the knee to this throned majesty among artists. Perhaps one of Godowsky's most admirable attributes is his simple, unswerving sincerity. For when a musician unites to his technical qualifications the perfect poise resulting from good taste, judgment, sympathy, and the calm wisdom of the inspired artist, a fine sincerity is a last and most moving touch.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

For Opera Lovers.

Monday evening the Chicago Grand Opera Company will open its second annual engagement of two weeks in the Civic Auditorium, which has been transformed into a commodious and practicable opera house. The boxes this year are built in a semi-circle similar to that of the "Metropolitan Horseshoe," and the rear sections of seats are raised to an elevation that will give every patron a direct view of the great stage.

The repertoire surpasses in interest the list of operas presented last year. In making her selections Mary Garden has endeavored to include as many comparative novelties as could be crowded into the brief engagement. Six operas which have not been heard here for many years will be revived. These are "Tannhäuser," "The Juggler of Notre Dame," "Louise," "Norma," "Salomé," and "The Girl of the Golden West." In response to hundreds of requests three operas—"The Love of Three Kings," "Rigoletto," and "Monna Vanna"—will be repeated from last year's repertoire.

Gabriel Govlez, the famous composer who has been conducting French opera for the Chicago forces this year, has been added by Miss Garden to the staff of conductors for their Western tour. He comes to San Francisco especially to conduct the performance of "Louise," in order that that opera of Parisian life may be presented with the genuine French spirit. This equips the company with four conductors for the local engagement, Giorgio Polacco having the principal place, with Pietro Cimmini and Alexander Smallens as assistants.

A spectacular performance of Verdi's "Aida," with the Pavley-Oukrainsky Ballet, a large chorus, and a stage band of forty, will open the fortnight's season Monday evening. On Tuesday evening Mary Garden will be heard here for the second time in her picturesque impersonation of Fiora in Montemezzi's lyric tragedy of medieval Italy, "The Love of Three Kings." Josef Schwarz, the Russian baritone whose American debut in the title rôle of "Rigoletto" was one of the memorable events of last season, will be heard again in the same part on Wednesday evening. This performance will be marked also by the first appearance here of Edith Mason. For Thursday evening "Tannhäuser" is scheduled, with a powerful cast including Rosa Raisa as Elizabeth, Cyrena Van Gordon as Venus, Edward Johnson as Tannhäuser, and Josef Schwarz as Wolfram. Massenet's miracle play, "The Juggler of Notre Dame," will be presented on Friday evening, with Mary Garden as Jean and Hector Dufranne as Boniface. At the Saturday matinee Edith Mason and Lucien Muratore will be heard in Gounod's melodic setting of "Romeo and Juliet," with Giorgio Polacco as conductor. The evening bill will be Wolf Ferrari's passionate opera of modern Neapolitan life, "The Jewels of the Madonna."

The second week of the engagement will begin on Monday evening, April 3d, with Charpentier's "Louise," in which Mary Garden will sing the title-rôle under the direction of Gabriel Govlez. On Tuesday night Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" will be given, with Edith Mason as Cio Cio San. "Norma" will be presented on Wednesday evening, with Rosa Raisa singing the soprano rôle. Richard Strauss' "Salomé," which has been the storm centre of so much controversy, is announced for Thursday evening, with Mary Garden in the title-rôle. Puccini's "La Bohème" is the offering for Friday night of the second week, with Edith Mason as Mimì.

The engagement will close with two performances on Saturday, April 8th. In the afternoon Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" will be performed under the direction of Alexander Smallens. The evening performance will be the repetition from last year, Mary Garden appearing again in the title-rôle of Fevrier's "Monna Vanna."

Comic Opera.

The Dunbar Comic Opera Company will open an engagement at the Columbia Theatre, Sunday, March 26th. "The Mikado" will be the initial presentation for the week. During the stay of the Dunbar Company there will be matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

The Dunbar Company will be remembered in San Francisco for its presentation of "Robin Hood" at the Columbia Theatre in December. An enlarged chorus enhances the value of the plays. The cast includes Theo Pennington, Nellie Andrews, Paula Ayres, Harry Pfeil, Edward Andrews, George Olsen, Carl Bunsch, William Degan, and George O'Donnell.

For the week beginning April 2d "H. M. S. Pinafore" will be offered, and "The Bohemian Girl" during the week beginning April 9th.

The Orpheum Next Week.

American audiences know Adelaide and Hughes well. They have found time to appear frequently abroad, but most of their professional career has been devoted to entertaining their own folks. They have appeared in musical comedy and in vaudeville, invariably with the highest artistic success and on each of their engagements they have a new routine. This engagement is no exception, and it is said that their programme this year is their best. It is handsomely costumed and staged and Joseph Michael Daly presides at the piano.

Making the British laugh right out loud is supposed to be an almost impossible accomplishment. Frank Van Hoven ties knots in this year tradition. He succeeded, not only in making his British audiences smile, but figuratively threw them into paroxysms of hilarious laughter, and by so doing he became one of the most popular American comedians who ever went to London. Van Hoven is a unique entertainer with a comedy effect that is quite unforgettable and has led to innumerable attempts at imitation.

A spectacular riding novelty is offered by James Dutton and company, the society equestrians. In a stage dressing of velvet curtains Mr. Dutton and his two pretty assistants execute a number of difficult feats of bareback riding. The horses are nearly white and a white dog adds to the picture.

"Watch Your Step." It isn't necessary when is as sure footed as the Four Ortons. A slender strand of wire under their feet answers the purpose of the most substantial foundation. Their athletic gyrations lend to comedy, which is permitted to repose principally in the care of that awful Orton, "The Duke of Duck." This chap is as dextrous as the others, and for his fun often resorts to an exceedingly difficult and hazardous feat.

Mrs. Sidney Drew with Thomas Carrigan in "Predestination" will remain a second week, as will Ray and Emma Dean.

Last Night at the Maitland.

Arthur Maitland will bring his "little theatre" activities to a close in San Francisco on Saturday, when, after a matinee and the evening performances of Edward J. Locke's charming play, "The Climax," the Maitland Playhouse will be closed permanently.

Mr. Maitland is leaving on the first of next month for Portland, Maine, where he has entered into a contract with the people of that city, who are constructing a theatre for him. This project forces the closing of the Maitland before the contemplated end of the season.

"Wild Birds."

The most important production of the Greek Theatre Players this season will be "Wild Birds," by Dan Totheroh of San Francisco, which will have its initial performance on Saturday night, March 25th. This play won the $300 prize offered in 1921 by the Greek Theatre for the best play by a California author.

The action of the play takes place in a remote rural community. Its theme is the first love experience of an adolescent boy and girl. The ignorance of the people who surround them distorts and finally kills the relation of the young people. Unlike many modern American plays, this one is free from propaganda and sociological preoccupations, although it reflects directly certain typical elements in American life. Its construction is sure and deft, owing perhaps to the experience which the Players Theatre of San Francisco has offered Mr. Totheroh.

Irving Pichel and Violette Wilson play the parts of Adam Larsen and Mazie. Mary Babcock and Harold Luck play the parts of Mrs. Slag and John Slag, the two people who finally bring ruin upon Mazie and Adam. Corrie Slag, their daughter, will be played by Mary Morris. Other parts will be taken by Lloyd Corrigan, Elwyn Rafetto, Dorothy Luck, Albert Lee, and Edward Hogan.

Godowsky's Concluding Appearance

Leopold Godowsky and his masterly pianism will be in evidence again Sunday afternoon, at the Scottish Rite Auditorium. It is said that this will be Godowsky's farewell appearance in San Francisco for a period of four years. In addition to the numbers on the announced programme, Mr. Godowsky will give many extra and encore numbers.

Miss Penman Remains.

Miss Lea Penman, leading lady of the Maitland playhouse, will not, contrary to previous announcements, accompany the Maitlands East, but will take a needed vacation on the Coast.

"The Sorcerer" at the Players.

More than usual interest is being taken in the revival of Gilbert and Sullivan's opera, "The Sorcerer." The first performance will take place at the Players Theatre, Friday evening, March 31st.

Reginald Travers, the director, announces that the cast selected is quite the strongest ever seen in any of the Players Club's operatic performances. The rôles are to be interpreted by the following principals and a chorus of forty: S. Ralph Kellner, Trafford Charlton, Easton Kent, Nelson McGee, Joseph D. Hamilton, Frederic McNulty, Carl Vinther, George H. Hooke, Richard Leonard, Baldwin McGaw, Sallie Benfield, Ruth Scott Laidlaw, Marguerite Fry Silvey, Jane Parent, Atha A. Hillback, and Floye Lewis Giffin.

Austin Mosher is musical director and George H. Hooke choral master. Special ballets are under the direction of Katharine Edson, and the costumes and scenery are designed by Gerstle Mack.

"The Sorcerer" was originally done in New York at the Casino with Lillian Russell and Henry Dixey in the cast. It has not been heard in San Francisco since the old Tivoli days.

There are only two more performances of "Plots and Playwrights," by Edward Massey, on March 24th and 25th.

New Orleans—Past and Present.

New Orleans is the one centre of population over which Uncle Sam has jurisdiction which has floated the flag of five separate rulers and in the picturesqueness which comes only of such political vicissitudes it resembles more closely cities of the Old World. Originally French and named for the saintly king who led the crusades, Louisiana and its capital city passed into the hands of the Spanish. Then the British flag flew briefly from the pole in Place d'Armes, and this was replaced by the Stars and Stripes. This was pulled down for the flag of the Confederacy and again was replaced by the Star-Spangled Banner. Not even Quebec, which is much more ancient, has the wealth of legendary history and ghosts and phantoms flitting about its narrow, crooked streets. The visitor is told that on certain darkened nights in the old Creole streets, near the French market, and the ancient cemeteries riverward, weird phantoms rove at will. Some bold spirits haunt those houses where the conspirators lived who planned Napoleon's deliverance from St. Helena—so goes the tale. Its once famous carnivals have lost so much of their brilliancy and vogue that it seems reasonable to accept the prophecy that in less than a decade they will pass into history like those of Venice, Rome, and Nice. But the old city remains, where the food seems to surpass even that of Paris, where the opera flourishes as in New York, and for a longer period every winter, and where all the loveliness of flowers and fruit may be enjoyed as on the Riviera.

No one knows real monotony like the wife who has finally succeeded in reforming her husband.—London Opinion.

VANITY FAIR.

It is strange how Father Time, that endless old busybody with the Ingersoll hourglass and hacked-up scythe, and no other sartorial productions on him to speak of, brings the most irreconcilable things into agreement if you will only be patient and give him a chance. Here is the case of former President and now Chief Justice Taft. No one could ever accuse him, by any stretch of the most overstretched imagination, of radical propensities or any disposition to disturb vested interests or established professional rights not lawless in character. His whole career exhibits the marks of safe, sane, orderly conservatism. Since his elevation to his present office, the nation has frequently sighed the long, satisfied sigh of relief. Here was the rock of our foundation—a somewhat round rock, but hard-grained and heavy, stable with the inertia of avoidpoups in generous degree. As one gazed upon the familiar outlines of his figure, real or depicted, with its reliable contours and lack of adventurous or experimental angularities, one was moved to feel that the right pilot was on the bridge at last and the ship of state would be built on substantial underpinning—for feeling is seldom rational, and mixes its metaphors worse than a late lamented cocktail shaker.

And now Chief Justice Taft takes strange, but not untried ground. He arises before the national conference of bar associations and announces the opinion that we have all the lawyers we need, and there is likely to be no dearth of them. Wherein he almost aligns himself with one of the most pestiferous persons that ever disturbed peaceful society, for it was Jack Cade who said, according to that veracious chronicler of events, William Shakespeare, "The first thing we do, let's hang all the lawyers." Of course, our Chief Justice, most considerate and kindly of men, and, moreover, duly observant of the forms and safeguards of the law, does not suggest and would never sanction such very direct action as the reprehensible Cade proposed. What he urges is a sort of professional birth control, like Margaret Sanger—fewer legalistic infants and better ones—but unlike Mrs. Sanger he tells right out in meeting how it is to be done. It is to be done, not by the process of infant exposure and natural selection that now keep down the ranks of the legalistic infants by driving the unsuccessful into the real estate business or the insurance game, but by insisting upon two years of college training before matriculation at a law school. He goes even farther than the American Bar Association in this matter, and expresses the hope that a complete college course will be made prerequisite. If such a plan is to be put into effect, one wonders where we are to get any more of those rugged old legal practitioners who once were blacksmiths, or how Lincoln ever could have been admitted to the bar, or Jake Rauer permitted to practice on his own slow debtors.

Now that the last word has been said in facial camouflage and there is no longer a human feature that has not endured the maximum of artificial culture, from hirsutous pruning of brow and scalp to rebuilding noses surgically, our love of the artificial has had to find further outlet in the mask. As yet the mask has been limited to the stage. But there is no reason why it should be so limited. A mask is of course a very uncomfortable garment, but women are said to suffer willingly any torment in the acquisition of beauty, and men, while admittedly weaker in this respect, console themselves with the reflection that they stand less in need of improvement. Moreover, if we could all endure the discomfort of the mask for the altruistic purpose of propagating flu germs we should be able to wear them selfishly for our own improvement and in the interests of our neighbors' aesthetic nerve. So far as appearances go, Ponce de Léon's magic rejuvenator is at last at hand. Not only may all women now be Mary Pickfords; they can all be eternally young. Nor need the reformers protest. Ethically there is no difference between cementing artificial strata on the skin and wearing it loosely adjusted by ribbons. A suggestion for masquerade revels is that one wears one's natural face, as it would naturally be a complete disguise. This also is a valuable hint for royalty and politicians traveling incog. or any other person wishing to avoid being mobbed. The new contrivance will enable us to dodge creditors, bodesome acquaintances, and detectives. That alone would be worth a good bit of discomfort. And who can tell?—perhaps like the happy hypocrite in Max Beerbohm's fairy tale we would eventually grow into our lovely masks, a phenomenon which in the hypocrite's case saved him a monthly mask bill and won him the love of a beggar maid.

At least one great American biologist has discerned the fact that the aristocracies of the older European countries have become, through selected lines of descent, a separate race. The women, especially, are endowed with attributes, mental, temperamental, and physical, which set them off from the ordinary run of human beings. It is apparent in aristocratic bearing and that unconscious deportment, so difficult of acquisition, and even of imitation, by the families of wealthy brewers and others recently elevated to the peerage. The wealthy and powerful have had their choice of grace and beauty for wives so long that grace and beauty in extraordinary degree have come to characterize the ladies of England. This being so, it may justly be regarded as a bit of tragedy that one important specification recently found necessary should have been overlooked in the composition of the aristocratic feminine form. We refer to gauge, or breadth.

The omission to standardize it has led to consequences as grave in their way as the absence of a standard gauge for railway tracks might be. As long as the peeresses gyrated through orbits where there was plenty of space no serious trouble occurred; but at the wedding of the Princess Mary it was necessary to economize room, and then it became embarrassing. The lord chamberlain, Lord Atholl, proceeding on the assumption that sylph-like forms were the possession of all the peeresses, provided seating accommodations wherein the chairs were of sixteen-inch gauge. It was found that such units would not meet the situation at all, and that while there were a few young duchesses of fifteen-inch gauge, the average ran to about eighteen or nineteen. In a row of twenty-four chairs there would only be accommodations for twenty-one peeresses, even by sitting as tight as possible, which in many cases of long-standing jealousy might be conceived to be quite uncomfortable, mentally as well as physically. It was even whispered about that in the case of some of the older duchesses, two feet would not have been too much. The problem is a serious one to those entrusted with the administration of empire. At any time it is likely to arise in embarrassing and even exasperating form. A lot of twenty-four-inch duchesses trying to overflow onto one another's sixteen-inch chairs and still sit in a straight row might well threaten the stability of the white man's government.

The worst of it is that no matter how carefully their ancestors may have been selected for slimmness in youth, and love rarely looks much beyond youth when choosing a mate, the years pass on and the feminine form in most cases persists in getting broader and broader in spite of form-fitting devices, standard furniture, gauges, gigs, and restraining apparatus of all sorts whatsoever. It is too late to do anything about those peeresses who now exceed the standard gauge except to pray that violence and revolution may be averted. But the future is still somewhat within the control of the younger peers. Having had their attention directed to the necessities of the case, they should proceed in arranging their connubial alliances more carefully than ever.

The newspapers are making quite a to do about Mme. Lenin's first published portrait. We have heard much of the lady's modest shrinking from publicity and have given her all due credit for a quality but too rare in these press-agent-ridden days; a quality the more remarkable as dislike of the limelight is not the outstanding characteristic of the Soviet régime. We had pictured the typical Russian girl student, bobbed hair, square jaw, long Oriental eyes, and lithely slender figure. Alas for preconceived ideas. The explanation of Mme. Lenin's abnormal reluctance to face the camera is obvious. Her portrait is published at last. One deduces the lugubrious moral that when a woman is not vain, there is a reason.

It has been waggishly suggested in high circles of European society that, since peeresses were becoming waitresses and laundresses, the best course would be to raise domestic to the peerage. The law of compensation and compensated adjustment. Whether or not they are doing anything about it over there, we were quick to act on the suggestion here. True, we had to transmute the idea to a republican form. We can not make duchesses of serving maids. But the principle involved is identical. The transatlantic idea was to raise the dignity of servitude to befit the new servitors. Naturally enough, Boston, our transplanted English suburb, was the first section of our country to catch on. Boston University is offering a course for bellhops and waiters. Alas for the caste system that will creep into even the worst regulated of democracies. Gone are the days when the son of the average lower middle-class family blithely left high school and became a bellhop, dreaming that in the fullness of time he would become head waiter and eventually own the hotel. That era is passed. Bellhopping, waiting, and by implication hotel owning will soon become professions of the cultured uppish classes. Not every policeman, fireman, and butcher can send his boy to college. Policemen and druggists, perhaps, but not butchers and firemen. It is a most partial distinction.

The late Pope Benedict XV was a militant feminist and many times expressed the opinion that women had a great mission in the world, and for Christianity in particular, but he was as outspoken in his criticism as he was in his praise when some trait in woman did not meet with his approval. He thoroughly disliked short skirts. According to a story which has just come from Rome, the Pope noticed one day crossing the court of St. Damaso a woman who had called at the Vatican on some business with the secretariat. She was wearing the latest Paris style of skirt which barely covered the knees. Turning to one of the bishops near him, the Pope said: "I really can not understand some women. They have no respect for any one, not even the Pope. In the days of my youth I recall that all the young girls, my sisters for instance, were pestering their mothers to put them in long skirts. Now it appears that all the old women wish to wear short ones."

Chicago, Rhode Island, Reno, and all other American divorce resorts must yield the palm to Burma for the facility, economy, and expedition with which matrimonial knots can be untied. When, "on the road to Mandalay," a Burmese couple have agreed to separate, they simply light two candles, one for each, and watch and wait to see whose candle first burns down. The one whose fate has thus been decided leaves forever the common home; the unfortunate one can not take away anything but the clothes on his or her person. The other becomes the sole proprietor of the entire common property.

The following short sentence, says Bombaugh's "Facts and Fancies," was dictated by Lord Palmerston to eleven cabinet ministers, every one of whom made some mistake in spelling it: "It is disagreeable to witness the embarrassment of a harassed peddler gauging the symmetry of a peeled potato." Try it on your friends.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Ben Dierks has an express agency and transfer business in a village in Sonoma County. Recently he detailed one of his teamsters with a wagon and pair to take a San Francisco man and wife to their country place a few miles out of town. The bill, as composed by the teamster, read: "Haul grip, grub, and people, three hours, three dollars."

As many persons are aware, most of the older streets in Montreal are named after saints, male and female. A progressive Yankee has a typical American drug store at the corner of two of these streets, and last summer he put the following sign in his window: "Meet your girl here for an ice-cream soda. This is where St. Thomas meets St. Genevieve."

A congressman took a taxi one rainy day from the Capitol to his home in the suburbs. Upon arrival the chauffeur charged him four dollars. "But," protested the member of Congress, "you are charging me for four miles. I understand the distance is only two and a half miles." "It is, as a general thing, sir," assented the taxi driver, "but, you see, we skidded a lot."

An old Scotchman, David Gordon, who was seriously ill, had been wheeled by his relatives into making a will. They were gathered about his bedside watching him laboriously sign it. He struggled as far as D-a-v-i-d, then fell back exhausted. "D, Uncle David, D," urged a nephew. "Dee!" ejaculated the old Scot with feeble indignation. "I'll dee when I'm ready, you avaricious wretch!"

A story was recently told to exemplify the pride which every man should take in the work by which he makes his living, no matter how humble it may be. Two street sweepers, seated on a curbstone, were discussing a comrade who had died the day before. "Bill certainly was a good sweeper," said one. "Ye-e-s," conceded the other thoughtfully. "But don't you think he was a little weak around the lamp posts?"

Dean Inge told a story recently that is like to endanger his reputation for gloominess. He was remarking that the byways as well as the highways of church life furnish much in the way of wit and humor. He proceeded to relate the story of a certain rector's cook. One evening they allowed her to choose the hymn for family prayers. When the ceremony was over the vicar's wife said to her: "That was a very nice hymn you chose this evening, cook!" "Yes, mum," said the cook, "it's the number of my policeman."

Senator Lenroot tells a story that emphasizes the safety of the maillard as a bathing garment. A beautiful Eastern girl unused to the sleeveless, legless garment appeared in one on a California beach and gazed timidly at the tremendous Pacific breakers. "Is it safe?" she asked an attendant. "That wild sea makes me nervous." "Don't be nervous, lady," said the attendant, studying the girl's figure with respectful admiration. "All the young fellers'll be keeping an eye on you all the time."

"Before Shackleton sailed south on the Quest," said a friend, "he got all kinds of boxes and packages from cranks—tea tablets, medicated whisky, cowhide underwear, compressed fuel, and so forth. A club acquaintance sent him a small keg labeled, 'Not to be opened till the furthestest point south is reached.' But Shackleton, a wily bird, opened the keg at once. It was full of lard or some such substance, and inside the cover was this word: 'Axle grease for the pole.'"

A teacher at a certain private school strives to instill filial devotion in her pupils. Recently she asked her class in what way they had been helping their parents. Various answers were given of a more or less to-be-expected nature, till she reached a little girl who had been casting rather contemptuous glances at the humdrum reports. When her turn came the eyes of the others were fixed on her as she lives in an opulent home that boasts a staff of servants. "Well, Gracie," the teacher asked, "what have you been doing to help mamma?" "Oh, lots," was the scornful response of Gracie, "but mostly I go to the country club and get cigarettes for her."

Miss Jane Addams of Hull House said at a Chicago tea: "Laundry prices are so high that clean things are a luxury, even to dukes. The old Duke of Devonshire once saw in a newspaper that among a certain young bride's wedding presents was a set of silver napkin rings. 'What the devil are napkin rings?' the duke asked. 'In a certain class of society,' a noble sociologist explained, 'clean napkins are not furnished with every meal, and therefore each member of the family has a distinctive napkin ring.' The old duke thought this over in silence for a long time. Then he exclaimed: 'Good God!'

In an engineer officers' training school the senior officer had his own ideas about examinations. He lined the applicants up and pointed to the open doorway, beyond which lay a pile of sand and cement and a prostrate flagpole. "Suppose," he demanded, "you were captain of a company and you wished to erect that flagpole. How would you go about it?" The further he got down the line, the more complicated became the answers. Finally he arrived at the last man. "Sir, if I was captain of the company," replied this candidate, "and wanted to erect that flagpole, I'd call the top kicker and say: 'Sergeant, put up that flagpole, and be snappy about it.'"

James K. Hackett, who played Shakespeare very successfully during the Paris season by invitation of the French government, told an entertaining story recently. "Once after a performance of 'Macbeth,'" he said, "a card was brought in to me, and I consented to see its owner, though he was a stranger. Well, the man came in pompously enough. He was elderly and he was afflicted with a bad stutter. He w-wanted to k-know, however, if I hadn't a vacancy for him, as it was his heart's desire to be a great tragedian. Well, I said, of course, that I could do nothing for him. So he took up his hat, heaved a deep sigh, and murmured: 'Then I'll have to k-keep on t-teaching elocution for the p-present.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Thackeray's Rhymed Review.

(The rhymed review is not a new journalistic stunt by any means. The following is Thackeray's rhymed review of "The Sorrows of Werther"—Goethe's sentimental novel.)

Werther had a love for Charlotte
Such as words could never utter;
Would you know how first he met her?
She was cutting bread and butter.

Charlotte was a married lady,
And a moral man was Werther,
And for all the wealth of Indies,
Would do nothing for to hurt her.

So he sigh'd and pined and ogled,
And his passion boiled and bubbled,
Till he blew his silly brains out,
And no more was by it troubled.

Charlotte, having seen his body
Borne before her on a shutter,
Like a well-conducted person,
Went on cutting bread and butter.

Napoleonic Relics.

Mrs. Charles Joseph Bonaparte, though long past the years when active service is obligatory, socially or otherwise, is spending much of her day on the data requisite to make intelligent for the casual visitor the important collection of Napoleonic relics bequeathed by the late Attorney-General to the Peabody Library of Baltimore.

This collection had been gathered by that intrepid Betsy Patterson, who made so many chapters of history, political as well as ecclesiastical, during the régime of the first Napoleon. Her many years of exile while struggling for the recognition of the rights of her son, young Jerome Bonaparte, included those immediately after Waterloo, when it was not difficult to get souvenirs of the most personal sort of the fallen emperor, of his empress, Marie Louise, and of the former empress, Josephine. There are some exquisite miniatures of the various members of the Bonaparte families and of the marshals and other distinguished men of that era, together with documents rare and interesting. Swords, small arms, and some flags are also in this collection, with a few articles of jewelry and the costumes worn by Miss Patterson and the faithless Jerome on the occasion of the marriage by Bishop Carroll of Baltimore, December 30, 1803. Some of the historic correspondence which Mme. Jerome Bonaparte had with the Vatican about the validity of her marriage is also included in the documentary bequest. Pope Pius VII, who upheld the action of the vicar of the Catholic Church in the United States in marrying the brother of the emperor to Miss Patterson, was subsequently imprisoned by Napoleon.

El Imparcial, a Spanish paper, publishes a report from Santibanez of the discovery there of extensive remains of what apparently was once a Roman city. Traces of a highway running in the direction of Astorga; cisterns, with piping of copper; gold coins, fragments of ceramics, and vases filled with ashes are said to have been unearthed in the vicinity. An investigation has been ordered.

A woman at Cleveland, Ohio, after attending a revival meeting, admitted that she had divorced eight husbands. There is some talk of her being elected an honorary cinema star.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

THE ASSOCIATED CHARITIES.

Relief work conducted by the people of San Francisco through the Associated Charities for the year 1921 reached the unprecedented figure of 10,796 individuals cared for, according to the report just made public.

While disclosing a record economy in application of the funds supplied, the report states that the extent of destitution in 1921 was such as to leave the association with a serious deficit. The following expenditure report of the Associated Charities dollar for dollar for 1921 is cited by the officials as definite assurance that every dollar invested by public-spirited San Franciscans is expended to create a maximum of relief:

Relief in kind, food, clothing, and shelter, $8,715; relief in service, $0,748. Out of every dollar the report announces $9463 spent in direct relief, with a minimized overhead cost of $0,537.

In explanation of the remarkably low overhead cost it is said by the directors of the association that this has been made possible by a foster-mother system that is unsurpassed in the United States. This system "provides the wholesome surrounding of actual home life and the devoted care of foster-mothers, selected for their deep sympathy and intelligent ministrations in behalf of their charges."

Under the head of family relief, 1993 families were provided for, a total embracing 3269 adults and 5202 children. Emergency relief was extended to these people for some time of the year, amounting in terms of continued support to the care of 543 children. Supported in part by Associated Charities funds and in part by state and county funds, 1760 children were provided for under the care of their own or foster-mothers. Without taking into consideration the number of children receiving widow's pension money through the disbursing agency of the association, the San Francisco organization supported 9699 individuals wholly or in part for some portion of the year. Of these, 6430 were children.

A development of importance for the year past, it is stated, has been in the relief work conducted in behalf of unmarried mothers. This department gets in touch with young unmarried mothers before confinement or while in the hospital. Its work is to provide convalescent care and other material relief when needed, and help plan for the future of mother and baby. The expenditure in the department of unmarried mothers for 1921 was $3514, administered by a social worker of special qualifications who has been recognized by the San Francisco Hospital in the follow-up of its maternity department. It is her duty to co-operate closely with the other hospitals and form a connecting link between the hospitals, the child-caring agencies, and all other rescue homes in good standing.

While the Associated Charities is not provided with a force large enough to do constructive relief work for all whose temporary need it meets, intensive care is rendered to its foster home children, to pensioned mothers, and to the sick and suffering.

A pressing need of workers to make possible the relief needed by many families and children is made public. Particular demand exists for visiting nurses to care for the sick in their homes and the babies in foster homes. Trained workers are also needed to guide and supervise the foster-children.

Nobiliary orders and badges of honor in Germany hitherto, upon the death of the owner, have been left as souvenirs to his heirs, though only upon payment to the state of their bullion value. Now the prime minister announces that because of the increased value of gold he is compelled, in the interest of the state, to increase by 100 per cent. the prices of all such decorations. It does not appear that this applies to the Iron Cross, though it has been so numerous awarded, one would think, as materially to affect the supply of that most useful metal.

INDIA'S ONLY WOMAN MONARCH.

The Wali of Kalat, the Jam of Las Bela, the Gaekwar of Baroda, and the Begum of Bhopal.

These are not countersigns for secret societies nor characters in the latest musical-comedy hit, but flesh and blood rulers whose names turn up in the news now and then to make weary editors tear their hair. Upon the latest to break into the front pages—the Begum of Bhopal, who has just entertained the Prince of Wales—some light is thrown by a bulletin on Bhopal issued by the National Geographic Society.

"Bhopal upsets a good many cherished Western Hemisphere notions of the East and its customs," says the bulletin. "The country is ruled by Mahometans, in whose eyes women are popularly supposed to be inferior beings existing for man's pleasure, and who must be kept carefully secluded from the world. Yet Bhopal has the only woman ruler in India, Sultan Jahan Begum, and she is actually the power in the land, ruling it actively. Moreover, she is not an exception in a long line of masculine rulers, as was Queen Victoria, but is the third successive Begum to rule the country. Her queer title, incidentally, is roughly the feminine equivalent of Nawab and Rajah. One Western conception she does not live up to. Though she appears constantly in public, she is always veiled. Few are her subjects indeed who know the appearance of the face that rules them."

"It is confusing, too, to the Westerner unfamiliar with India's hodge podge of religions to find that though Bhopal is the second most important Mahometan country in India, its population is 73 per cent. Hindu and only 13 per cent. Mahometan. Its present ruling family was founded by an Afghan soldier of fortune who leased some adjoining territory from the Mogul empire in 1708, took Bhopal by force of arms, and declared himself an independent Nawab.

"Bhopal is in almost the exact centre of India. It is slightly smaller than the State of New Jersey and has a population of close to three-quarters of a million. It is largely a plateau region, with considerable areas of fertile soil and large expanses of grass-covered downs which support cattle. In the patches of jungle leopards and tigers find cover and an abundance of wild fowl makes it a haven for the hunter.

"Bhopal City, the seat of the Begum, is one of the most picturesquely situated of the Indian capitals. Its surroundings testify to a high order of engineering ability on the part of the Indians when medieval Europeans were doing little to harness Nature's forces or to modify the face of the earth. With quaint terraced streets, the city is built up the side of a ridge 500 feet in height and its lower edge is bathed by a large artificial lake impounded by a massive dam. Just beyond this lake is a second large body of water held by a greater dam, which is believed to have been built in the eleventh century at the latest, and perhaps much earlier. The dam creating the larger lake also separates the two lakes, and near it is a great pile of white palaces. From the palaces a spacious flight of steps leads, through a huge gateway, to the water's edge. The city is about the size of St. Joseph, Missouri.

"Not far from Bhopal City are the ruins of an even more ambitious engineering project—dams which 1000 years ago created a lake 250 square miles in extent, which is said to have materially modified the climate in its neighborhood. The dams were destroyed nearly 100 years before Columbus crossed the Atlantic, and the old bed of the lake, whose soil is exceedingly rich, now produces a good part of the opium which Bhopal exports.

"Famine laid a heavy hand on Bhopal in 1899-1900, and the population at the following census showed a reduction of 30 per cent. Even today in many of the villages of the country abandoned houses are to be seen in various stages of decay. The country is progressive in many ways and dates much of its progress from its energetic first Begum, Sikandar, who introduced reforms which have been carried on by her daughter and granddaughter."

The state exhibit of California wild flowers opens at the St. Francis Hotel on April 20th, continuing until the 22d. The exhibit, given under the auspices of the Wild Flower Conservation League, which is doing excellent work in the state by stimulating an interest in the preservation of the native flora, has become a very popular institution. The work is directed by Mrs. Bertha M. Rice, head of the Wild Flower Conservation League. Several thousand San Francisco school children visited the display of flowers last year, in company with their teachers. Luther Burbank, David Starr Jordan, and other eminent scientists will participate in the programme this April.

Aerial Cartography.

New York City has been "mapped" from the air in sixty-nine minutes, according to an announcement from the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce, describing a new type of aerial camera perfected by Sherman M. Fairchild, president of the Fairchild Aerial Camera Company. Operating from an airplane at a height of 10,000 feet, the photographer snapped 100 photographs of that number of sections into which the city had been divided. "These photographs fitted together form a mosaic of thirty-two square miles area, showing distinctly every street and building," says the statement. "Even vehicles and pedestrians are discernible in the picture, just as one would see them if he were looking straight down from a height of two miles."

To assure this accuracy over unlimited areas, Mr. Fairchild developed what is known as a between-the-lens shutter which it is said actually saves the brief instant which other shutters spend traversing the plate during the exposure, says the New York Times. This instant would matter little in ordinary photography, but in mapping, or taking vertical views, the speed of the airplane would cause a distortion in the map. The perfected camera also includes an electric timing device and an automatic interval device. Mr. Fairchild, who is in his early twenties, said that the camera represented three years of experimentation.

An examination of the mosaic bears out the claims of Mr. Fairchild. It is possible to pick out virtually any building in the city. The Battery, Madison Square, Fifth Avenue, office buildings, private dwellings, as well as the various centres of traffic and population are portrayed in true proportion. The photograph is more than eight feet long and twenty inches wide.

City officials who have inspected the mosaic said that aerial photographs of this character had a practical value which was certain to be recognized.

"Such a photograph would be a great help to us in directing a raid or surrounding a burglar," Police Inspector Davis said. Commissioner Joseph Johnson of the department of public works said that he had intended going by automobile to inspect two proposed operations, but with the map in front of him he found he could attend to the task without leaving his office.

The Ring and the Girl.

Solomonic judgment on property rights in engagement rings comes from New York. According to the New York Times, a $660 diamond engagement ring in the life of Morris Herschowitz, chauffeur, is as nothing when compared with the charms of Miss Sadie Neudlman. But a $660 diamond ring in the life of Miss Neudlman, when compared with Morris, is something to be thought over carefully.

Justice William Caffrey, in the Eighth District Municipal Court, heard the case of Herschowitz against Neudlman. The ring, it appeared, was given by Morris to Sadie last August with the understanding that the wedding was to take place after the Jewish holidays last fall. By Morris' version, he asked her, when the time came, but Morris said she merely looked at and through him and asked him whence came the original idea—or words to that effect.

Indeed, Morris told the court, Miss Neudlman spoke of her big brother and his ability to separate Morris from the Neudlman household, should he, Morris, ever bring up the subject of matrimony again. However, as Morris explained, he asked her right away: "You promised to marry me, didn't you?" Morris said Sadie responded by putting him out of the house.

Then Miss Neudlman told her side. Certainly, Morris had given her the ring, but it had been understood that the wedding would not be until her older sister was married, which event might occur tomorrow, next week, or next year, but which certainly would take place. After her explanation, Herschowitz told how he and Sadie had been sweethearts for ten years. Then Justice Caffrey picked up the ring and, holding it between his thumb and forefinger, asked Morris:

"Do you want this precious stone or do you want this precious girl?"

"I want the girl," promptly replied Herschowitz.

"And do you," said the justice to the girl, "want to marry Morris?"

Sadie looked at Morris and at the ring and falteringly said, "I'll have to think it over."

"Well," replied the judge, rapping for the next case, "you'll either marry Herschowitz by June 25th or forfeit the ring."

"I hear tell that a passel of fellers out hunting over tuther side of Mount Pisgah seed a wild boy and took a shot at him yiste'd'y," related a neighbor. "They say he didn't have any clothes on and ran like a deer." "That so?" returned Gap Johnson of Rumpus Ridge, Ark. "Aw, well, he haint none of my children as far as I know. Tennyrate, my wife has been making so much pester for the last three, four months, about the kids not having anything to wear, that tuther day when I sold a hoss I bought a whole bolt of cloth, and I reckon likely by this time she's made 'em all the britches and one thing and another they need. If they're running around naked it's their own fault."—Kansas City Star.

Germany's Turn.

Herr Doctor Chancellor Wirt of Germany, speaking of the coming economic conference at Genoa, expresses the fear that it may treat the problem of rehabilitating Germany in a "spirit of arbitrary dictation." There is some ground for his apprehension. When a whole nation behaves in such a manner that it treats every concession as a sign of mental weakness, every effort at conciliatory policies as symptomatic of fear, when its leaders harbor the theory that the peoples they have wronged, and the nations large parts of whose territory they have destroyed, are impudent beggar children to be flouted and further wronged to the end of time, when "arbitrary dictation" is proved by long experience to be the only sort of thing that nation can understand, when its commercial leader prepares to insult the world afresh by sending over the seven seas the names of Ludendorff, Tirpitz, and Buelow as the names of three great German ships, there is some reason to believe that arbitrary dictation is in sight. And the sooner it is applied the sooner will the bill of damages be paid and the financial world set running again. It can not be done amiably and with consideration for the feelings of a people that consider no feelings but their own.

It is an iniquitous thing, and one not to be borne by any statesmanship that believes in the necessity of justice as a basis of world stability, that the taxes in Germany today are far lower per capita of population than they are in France. The plain meaning of that is that the aggressor in the war, and the loser of the war, is in better financial condition than the nation attacked and wronged. No economic obfuscations by German financial experts or sympathizers should be permitted to veil this condition or blind us to its significance. It is Germany's turn to "give until it hurts," and there can be little doubt that arbitrary dictation is the only way to bring that about.

The Four-Power Treaty and Senator Johnson.

As to the ultimate authority of the Four-Power treaty, or any other "scrap of paper," opinions differ. But there can be no doubt that the popular mind of America finds in this engagement a hope, if not a guaranty, of peace. If it lacks the merit of assurance, it has at least the value of defining an ideal, and in the inter-relationships of nations ideals count for something. Even Bismarck grasped this principle. His prophecy of forty years ago that in the next war "victory will be determined by the 'imponderables'" was a tribute to the force of ideals, in other words of moral motives. Recent events impress the lesson. But for the "imponderables"—but for the fact that she fought against ideals of equity and of sentiment—Germany would have won the war.

Yet in prudence it is to be borne in mind that international engagements, however ideally conceived and however ceremoniously confirmed, rest upon a shifting foundation. The policies of nations are determined by their interests or their passions; and as the interest or temper of future times may differ from the interest or temper of today, so the policy of today may become obsolete. The only assurance of good faith and amity between nations lies in mutual understanding. When that is lost, when understanding and good-will are transmuted into passion, "scraps of paper" have not hitherto served to stay the wrath of nations.

It is at this point that hopes are based upon the Four-Power treaty. It is an agreement between four nations with large interests in the Pacific Ocean to "respect" each other's rights as they are now established and recognized. Further, it is an agreement between the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan, should any difficulties arise between them, or should any other power threaten the peace of the Pacific, to meet in conference and talk things over. This agreement is to remain in force for ten years and continue after that time subject to the right of any one of the contracting parties to terminate it upon twelve months' notice. That harm may come out of this simple engagement is not conceivable. That good may come of it is probable. We have a concrete illustration in achievements of the Conference recently held at Washington. It has dissipated clouds that have caused anxiety in recent times. It has established an atmosphere of good-will where before there was jealousy and apprehension. It has cleared up the scandal of Shantung and it has brought about conditions tending to protection of China against policies of selfishness and aggression. So much has been achieved tending to sustained international equities as to afford hope for effects similarly to be worked out in times to come under the conference system. Not everybody, as has been developed in senatorial discussions at Washington, shares this hope. But those who doubt are few as compared with the many who see in the arrangement a distinct step in the progress of international relationships.

Throughout the country public sentiment has hailed ratification of the Four-Power treaty with approval, even with enthusiasm. It is appraised in California as a settlement of differences between this country and Japan that have long ranked—and rankled —as an "issue." It was, therefore, a disappointment and a matter of chagrin that our senior senator took ground against the treaty and against the Administration, joining his efforts to defeat ratification with the Democratic minority and with those of a little group of chronic objectors. The great meeting held in the San Francisco Auditorium last week was designed not more in approval of the Four-Power treaty than as a protest against Senator Johnson's course in opposing it. The meeting as representing the sentiment of California did not go beyond the mark in declaring that "the attitude of Senator Hiram W. Johnson does not reflect our sober and earnest convictions."

Senator Johnson's answer to the chairman of the meeting is worthy of attention—indeed of admiration—not as justifying his judgment, but as defining a standard of conscientious and spirited action on the part of men in representative position. "I am always glad," he said, "to have the views of a considerable number of my constituents. * * * I recognize the right of every man to his opinion and to the public expression of that opinion, * * * but I recognize, too, that one who occupies a position as United States senator must, in the questions which come to him, reach his decisions and cast his votes as his judgment and his conscience dictate. He would, indeed, be a poor and contemptible representative who yielded his conscience and his judgment to every varying popular gust, or to every demand which might be made upon him by groups or individuals."

Here is a clear and forcible expression of a spirit in accord with the best traditions that have come down from the earlier days of our representative system. Here is declared a principle that every thoughtful man must respect. It is a principle which, if sustained upon the basis of intelligence and of moral conviction, should control in representative government. In glowing phrases it condemns and rebukes the cringing subserviency that yields to "every varying gust." That we have and have had too much of that sort of thing all will admit.

But from Senator Johnson this high declaration smacks of melodrama. It has the flavor of euphemy rather than of convincing force. It does not accord with Mr. Johnson's history or with his character. Now, for something more than a decade, Mr. Johnson has been a potent figure in the political life of California. He has been governor of the state. He has been a senator from California in the Congress of the United States. His activities have been incessant and the achievements associated with his name, if not wholly admirable, have been notable. But with all his very considerable personal force, with all the emphasis of his very considerable powers of expression, he has not been able to impress the people of California as a man of integrity of mind. Even his political friends, while stressing his "cleverness," have little or naught to say of his moral dependability. Mr. Johnson knows—none better—the value of rhetorical periods; they make the major part of his stock in trade. In the immediate instance he has declared in terms a sound and worthy principle in republican government. But it does not go down with the public because the public does not definitely respect the man. Coming from Julius Kahn—not to mention others—an expression like that above quoted would command whole-hearted respect because it would be convincing at the points of sincerity and integrity of mind. Coming from Mr. Johnson, it bears all the marks of a calculated euphemism, lacking the true ring of moral metal. Splendidly as it resounds, it does not in multitudes of minds nullify the impression that Mr. Johnson's attitude in the matter immediately at issue had its inspiration in motives less worthy than he would have us believe. His course in the matter of the treaty follows too ously the policies of his friend and patron, Mr. Hearst. It dovetails too precisely with his instinct of detraction, his habit of denunciation, his propensity to offensive combat.

The fact that Mr. Johnson in a matter of profound importance has misinterpreted the sentiment of California, entered into alliance with the Democratic party, affiliated himself with the little group of chronic senatorial malcontents, and in effect broken with President Harding has stirred in many minds the suggestion that a man of steadier habits of thought and action and of more loyal type would better serve our interests in the Senate. It is argued that California as a Republican state ought to be represented by a man definitely and dependably a Republican. It is argued, further, that both the sentiment and the interests of California call for coöperation on the part of her representatives with the Harding administration. There is force in these presentments. Assuredly a majority of the people of California would prefer to see in the post now held by Mr. Johnson a man of less combative spirit, a man free from association with the Borahs and the La Follettes, a man pledged under the commitments of party loyalty, a man unsmirched by affiliation with Hearstism. There are those who believe that in the coming election a man of another and better spirit might win over Mr. Johnson. But there are many who doubt it. The man at once competent, willing, and available may be difficult to find. The Johnson political machine, though perhaps not what it once was, is still the largest concrete force in the political life of the state. It came into existence under conditions now past; in reality it is an anachronism, but it remains a force to be reckoned with.

Incidental to Prohibition.

In the course of a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives last week Mr. Crissinger, Comptroller of the Currency, testified that many banks in various parts of the country are loaded up with "questionable loans." The phrase was a bit of delicate camouflage covering the fact that a surprising number of banks, notably in Florida, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and even the national capital, hold bootleggers' paper running in the aggregate to tens of millions of dollars. A single bank on the Atlantic seaboard has been found to be carrying paper to the extent of a million dollars of a man engaged in a fraudulent deal in "kosher" wine, imported ostensibly to supply the needs of Jewish congregations, whose members under the law are permitted to have ten gallons of wine a year. Other banks have been found heavily involved in the same deal. But it is not alone in kosher wine that many banks of the country are participating as financial backers—in other words, as partners—in the bootlegging business. All up and down the Atlantic coast and to a limited extent on the Pacific side of the continent banks have been supplying funds to men whose business, known to the bankers or otherwise, is that of importing and selling liquors in contempt of the Volstead Act. The fact is illustrative of a condition in which the country has been plunged by an effort to do an impossible thing, namely, to substitute an arbitrary legal regulation for a law of custom established immemorially and fixed in the habits of millions of persons.

In the kosher wine deal above referred to the banks involved were compelled to take over great stocks in warehouses when the prohibition enforcement officers shut down on methods of distribution that were in practice only a few weeks ago. The Comptroller is compelling these banks, as he discovers the facts, to force liquidation of "questionable" paper. But the astounding fact is that if he should press his demands too hard a number of banks of high standing would have to close their doors. This is not saying that the government is a party to any deal by which the banks are permitted to dispose of the stocks of liquors which many of them are holding as security for loans, but it is not giving them sufficient leeway to get out without serious loss. The matter is being handled discreetly, and it is well, since radical action on the part of the government would inevitably prove disastrous.

Some of the ramifications of the colossal deal in kosher wine have humorous aspects. For example, a great number of fake rabbis were certified to by former Prohibition Commissioner Kramer and were duly recognized by him. They were distributors for the so-called kosher wine. Many of these fake rabbis sold cards certifying that the holder is a member of a Jewish congregation and thus entitled to a wine ration. This phase of the conspiracy was exposed some weeks back in New York. The names of Houlihan, Murphy, Moriarity, Olsen, Schmidt, Johnson, Rutherford, Sinclair, McLeod, and Milliken were found among those who had cards declaring them to be attendants at mythical synagogues. Prohibition officers find that the fake rabbi game has been active in California, particularly in the vicinity of Hollywood, where if the certificates of synagogue membership are to be believed a majority of the population is made up of Jews. One member of the Hollywood colony was found to hold membership in five congregations, no one of which seems to have a substantial existence.

Where There Is No Peace.

We are told, and have no difficulty in believing, that Senator Johnson will return to California and endeavor to replenish his depleted political stock by jumping into a fight on the Japanese. Former Senator Phelan, though of the opposing party, has been in Japan assembling arms and armor for the same dismal conflict, and from the same side. It is not conceivable that so much belligerent disposition and such abundant ammunition should go entirely to waste—so any faint prospects we ever thought we had discerned of a peaceful and dignified senatorial contest are already obscured by the preliminary dust of combat. It looks as though no matter who the opposing candidates in either party may be, we are in for another tiresome political battle on an issue of which many persons in this state are grown intolerably weary, and from which they have had reason to believe they might some day enjoy a needed rest.

Senator Johnson is a sort of paleontological survival from the fighting age. He first came into public notice as a fighter, and he remained in the public eye in that character. Even James J. Corbett left the ring for the stage, but not so Senator Johnson. He stays on after his geological period has passed, like the plesiosaurus now supposed to infest the otherwise peaceful waters of a Patagonian lake. We do not mean to suggest any particular physical resemblance—he has not a swan's neck and a horse's head, as the plesiosaurus now figuring in the news dispatches is said to have. Nor could he be compared to the extinct megalotherium, the giant sloth of the Pleistocene deposits. He may be out on a limb, but we have not thought that California's senior senator got there after the manner of the sloth, hanging on by his feet and progressing horizontally dorsal side down. Nor does he much resemble the archæopteryx, although the archæopteryx was a bird. He seems more like the carnivorous, or meat-eating dinosaur, of the Upper Jurassic, standing ever on his hind feet and using his head for those rending and battering functions to which it is so admirably adapted. And his outer integument suggests the impenetrable plates of the giant armadillo.

Of course, Senator Johnson's political beginnings are somewhat less remote than the geological epochs to which we have referred. The course of man is more quickly run. It is but a few short years since he began to sacrifice himself to Great Moral Causes, and to stand depicted in solemn cartoons hand in hand with Roosevelt. The point is that the times and battles which called him forth are over, the trumpet blasts are stilled, the captured banners of the enemy are gathering dust in the cathedrals of the righteous—that is to say, the offices of the clutter of expensive commissions we owe to his great political organizing ability; while he wishes to go right on fighting battles, because he is a fighting man and sees nothing unless he sees it red.

Grant said: "Let us have peace." That is the aspiration of a weary world. The time has come when we should have it. It seems as though, in California at least, we might enjoy a breathing spell in an era of good will. But apparently it is not to be if Senator Johnson can prevent it, and if his political fortunes can be made to thrive in the welter of more wars, though they be but verbal ones. It is a great pity, and a great disappointment.

The Army and Navy Proposals.

It is gratifying to learn that President Harding intends to resist to the limit of his powers the attempt being made in the House arbitrarily to cut appropriations for the army and navy far below the figures determined by the Administration as the minimum of safety. Secretary of War Weeks and Julius Kahn, both in active opposition to radical proposals, are not acting in the dark.

The demands made in Congress for radical reduction come almost entirely from the old pacifist element that did so much in 1915 and 1916 to prevent adequate preparation for an inevitable war and which refuses to profit by the lessons of experience. There is no general demand for the radical cuts proposed, and such of the leading members of the House as are giving countenance to the pacifist propaganda are doing so from petty motives. For one thing, jealousy of the reputation for economy achieved by the Dawes Budget Bureau is felt by certain leading members of Congress. They want to exhibit themselves as more efficient money savers than the executive officers of the government; and to the end of such a showing they make no scruple of sacrificing the dignity and even the security of the country.

The champions of a melodramatic economy in military expenditure propose to withdraw the garrisons from Hawaii, from the Philippines, from China, and from the Canal Zone, and to so reduce the number of army officers as to make it physically impossible to carry out any project for adequately training the National Guard and the Organized Reserves as contemplated by the National Defense Act of 1920. They would make the navy hopelessly ineffective for any really important work and in general leave the military arm in a condition of disorganization and unpreparedness that has always cost so frightfully in lives and money when we have had to unsheath the sword.

And with it all the proposed savings to be made are inconsequential when compared with other public and private expenditures. In a speech on the floor of the House last week Julius Kahn pointed out that the people of this country in the year 1921 expended for pipes and smokers' material a total of $1,151,000,000, or almost twice as much as the total estimates for army and navy. In 1921 the total appropriations for the army, including such civilian activities as rivers and harbors work, were $418,000,000. The Budget Bureau's estimate for the coming year is $360,000,000. In the same year the country spent for candy and chewing gum $750,000,000 and for soda water and confections $834,000,000.

In this matter of the army and navy we have another difference between the President and the House of Representatives to be added to the break with respect to the soldiers' bonus. Representatives Fordney and Mondell, respectively head of the Ways and Means Committee and majority leader, seem determined upon forcing a breach between the executive and the legislative branch. Mr. Harding still hopes to prevent an open split, but he is reported to be "getting madder and madder." In the matter of the army and navy appropriations he is taking the facts to the country over the head of Congress, and to a lesser degree he is pursuing the same course in regard to the bonus. Representative Lineberger of our own state, himself an ex-service man, is one of the few who realize the exact situation. He has pointed out to his colleagues that as they come up for reelection this fall they will find that the Harding administration stands higher with the country than does Congress and that they will do well to run as Harding Republicans rather than as anti-Harding Republicans. He is making some converts, and he has excited the fears of many timid ones.

Blasted Hopes.

Just when we had begun to have hopes for the moral future of our country, they are dashed mercilessly to the ground with the report of "false alarm." Yesterday word came from New York that our national morals were to be snatched from the edge of the precipice by the simple device of a municipal ordinance forbidding women to smoke in public. How simple and yet how effective! No longer would the hardened Harlemites have his faith in woman destroyed by the insidious poison of her nicotine breath. It might still be alcoholic, but even a New Yorker would scarcely be disillusioned by alcohol. And as all the world knows, tobacco is the most disillusioning substance there is. It is only one remove from dope. In fact the innocent New York clubmen, bohemians, and literati that frequent the places of amusement banned by our too unreal ordinance are no doubt reminded of Hollywood and "snow parties" when they see smoke emitted from feminine lips. And alas, they still will be reminded, for the ordinance whose existence we so fondly hailed yesterday is reported now to be non-existent. It does not exist and there never was such an ordinance.

We had even gone so far as to reconstruct the ancient Boston gag, "Lady, you will have to throw away that cigarette, you are not in New York," to "Lady, (etc.) you are not in Tijuana." However, while there is a W. C. T. U. there is hope. America may yet be saved.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Suggestion from Colonel Robert M. Thompson.

SANTA BARBARA, March 18, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: You will agree that unless Germany pays the Allies, the Allies (with the possible exception of England) can not pay us. If, then, Germany is unable to pay, we will lose the money that Europe owes us, and France will be humiliated by having to confess bankruptcy and inability to pay her debts.

We can prevent this, and set Europe's financial machine in order almost at once, by exchanging the bonds of the Allied nations that we hold for assignments of claims on Germany. By exchanging with England her bonds for the French bonds that she holds we would practically control all of the French exterior debt.

Europe owes us about ten and a half billion dollars, which is about one-third of the total amount which was assessed against Germany by the Reparations Commission. If Germany were to pay us four hundred millions a year for forty years it would take care of the interest on ten billions of 3 per cent. forty-year bonds, and leave one hundred million dollars for a sinking fund which would pay them at maturity.

Before the war the young men of Germany gave two years of their lives to learn how to destroy things, and they were supported by general taxation. If the young men continue to give two years of their lives for the benefit of Germany, but will learn how to produce things, their products will pay Germany's debt to the world.

For instance, in the past we have shipped to Germany as much as two million bales of cotton a year. She has the machinery and trained men to convert this into goods, which in the past were largely consumed by her own people. The goods made from a bale of cotton are on the average worth a hundred dollars more than the raw cotton.

If we were to ship two million bales of cotton to Germany in our own ships, the goods manufactured from this cotton would be worth two hundred million dollars more than the raw cotton, and the goods would be paid for by the German people, and not by the government.

In the same way, fifty or seventy-five millions more could be realized from copper; and potash, dyes, toys, and a few other specialties would make up the four hundred million dollars.

If our government were to offer the public a forty-year 3 per cent. government bond, free from all taxation, including inheritance taxes, they would at once be absorbed by our people in exchange for outstanding bonds; and as the German payments would take care of the interest and sinking fund, it would reduce the amount which we have to raise annually on account of the debt by four hundred twenty-five to four hundred fifty million dollars.

France would at once be relieved from all exterior debt and she would still have the balance of her claims against Germany; and what is better, she would have a renewed credit which would enable her to borrow in the markets of the world all that she needed to promptly rebuild her towns and works and restore her mines.

Our people have given liberally to France and to Belgium and to Russia, but the dribbles that we have given have helped the individual but have not helped the nation. Let us all take hold and do a big thing and really help France, and in helping France let us help the world.

Yours very truly,
ROBERT M. THOMPSON.

A Veteran's View of the Bonus.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 13, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I have just read the Argonaut of February 25th giving space to Mr. Gerstle's letter resigning from a Legion post because of his non-belief in payment of a "bonus."

His resignation in my opinion was a mistake. He should have fought the bonus from the inside, not outside the Legion, as thousands of Legionnaires are doing.

The writer entered the civil war April 19, 1861, for three months and three years service. Resigned June 30, 1864, to go home on crutches from wounds received in April, September, and November, 1863. Reentered the army June 13, 1867, and retired from disability June 28, 1878. Restored to active duty in world war and demobilized on eighty-third birthday, January 15, 1919.

To General Jackson is ascribed the saying, "To the victors belong the spoils." I believe in that doctrine, and not in a bonus. I do believe the American Legion should combine, nominate and elect a member of the Legion to every political office—Presidents, senators, representatives, all state, county, and city offices. And a good place to begin is in California by electing that gallant soldier and gentleman, Major Linberger, senator to succeed that puffball and would-be Jesus Christ of politics, Hiram Johnson. Comrades, that would be a bonus worth having.

The next election in California ought to send a Legionnaire representative from every district except Julius Kahn's. He is a valuable many in any Congress.

W. N. WILLIAMS.

The English in asking that the Victoria Cross be awarded to the cat which so heroically saved her young during the fire of the Printemps only follow an example given by the Queen of England herself. To appreciate the value of this reward we must remember that the Victoria Cross is for a soldier, general or private, the highest military order. In the last war at the utmost fifty have been awarded. However, several dogs belonging to the British army have received this honor. These were: Bob, of the Royal Berkshire, which in the Afghanistan war saved the life of several soldiers; Jack, which accomplished the same feats at the battle of the Alma, and Jerry, a hero of the Crimean war, which received from the city of Dublin a medal and—a dinner. The odds are that the mess made the dog happier than the medal.

THE PROBLEM OF ZIONISM.

It Is Beginning to Appear as a Troublesome Part of the International Turmoil.

A pause in the output of news and discussion about Zionism seems to indicate a pause in the development of that romantic movement, and perhaps it is just as well. The two things are more than merely coincidental. Toward the end of last year, Zionists began to admit that their aspirations had met with a check. There has been more or less turbulence in Palestine, manifesting itself in Mohammedan riots. Jews were killed at Jaffa, and Sir Herbert Samuel, the English high commissioner under mandate, had to announce a suspension of immigration. It seems to be another case where the Wilsonian doctrine of self-determination has had unexpected results because it was taken seriously by some unconsidered element of a mixed population.

Zionism was born of sentiment and literature, as well as of persecution. Its most engaging interpreter was probably the Jewish author, Israel Zangwill, the force and beauty of whose argumentation were of a quality to obscure the judgment with the rosy clouds of enthusiasm. Unfortunately it is a hard world, and sentiment and enthusiasm will not take us far against the obstacles of interest and selfishness and rooted beliefs. To make Palestine a national home for the Jewish people has been a fine thing to think about and talk about in London, but in Palestine itself it has proved another matter. London and the home government have been very strongly attached to the idea, but even an English Jew sent to Palestine as a high commissioner to aid in the accomplishment of the great and beautiful design encounters practical obstacles that make him hesitate, waver, and finally impose the temporary check himself. And it is found advisable, but probably not especially effective, to send propagandists to this country in the effort to bring about a revival of interest which will furnish the eternally needful funds to keep things going.

It cuts the heart out of a great and liberal impulse. But the trouble with Zionism is that it is not much more. It seems to lack basis in fact or necessity or possibility; possibility, at least, beyond the merest fractional solution of the Jewish problem. Palestine might be made a home for a few Jewish people—in fact it is already that, and has been for thousands of years. But making it "a national home for the Jewish people," if it has any meaning, means too much; it means far more than the present inhabitants of Palestine will submit to, and they appear quite ready to manifest self-determination by riots and massacre. That may be narrow-minded, but it is very real, and a thing statesmanship should have counted upon before Balfour made his celebrated declaration in 1917.

There is no present Jewish title to Palestine, in any valid sense. The old title was based upon the conquest of Canaan and the victory of David over the Jebusites. But if a title can be gained by conquest it can be lost in the same way, and the Jewish title was so lost. Neither can any right to the country as a national territory be based on the present occupancy, for the non-Jewish element is far too preponderant. Of the present inhabitants of the country, only about 12 per cent. is Jewish. The rest is to a larger degree Christian, to an overwhelming extent Mohammedan. The half-million Mohammedans will never consent to be governed by the 80,000 Jews. And unless the Jews are to be the governing body, what becomes of the aspiration toward a Jewish state? It is the conception of a Jewish state in Palestine that is of practical concern to the world. If Zionism had no political connotation, if it meant merely making Palestine the spiritual goal of the Jews, as it has been for centuries of many Christians and of many Mohammedans, if Balfour had constructed his phrase to read "a spiritual home for the Jewish people," the matter would have been merely one of private worship, and would have meant little more, in a practical sense, than the condition under which Jews have long been permitted to regard their former national home and resort to it if they chose for purposes of devotion and spiritual renewal. But Balfour's phrase, "national home," immediately gave fresh impulse to political Zionism, and in the possibilities of that the whole world, in its present techy and irritable state of mind and feeling, has a vital interest.

It has been pointed out by Israel Abrahams that the term "Jewish State" is self-contradictory because the thing itself has become impossible. "If it be Jewish it can not be a state; if it be a state it can not be Jewish." In other words, if it should admit to equal share in the government the other elements of the population, and in any rough proportion to the proportion of those elements, it would become a nation of mixed races. That is what most modern countries are, and none more so than the United States. And unless Palestine took that form it never could become a state at all. It is not conceivable that the world today would encourage the establishment of a political organism in which a small minority formed a privileged governing caste on account of some claim to superiority in its religious system, or some highly venerated way of regarding man's relations to the Deity. That would be Brahmanism. Such a government would not only be most undemocratic, but under present conditions it would be something equally bad: it would be unstable, and a constant menace to the peace of the world.

We can see some slight analogy to the Palestine condition in our own state of Utah. There a "chosen people" once constituted almost the whole of society. Today the Mormons number some 40 per cent. of the population of Salt Lake City, and about 70 per cent. of the population of the state outside of the metropolis. The political arrangements usually form a rough balance with the theological division; but even in the rural districts, Utah can not be regarded as a Mormon state. It is an American state. So are all the other states of the Union. Maryland is not a Roman Catholic state, Connecticut is not a Unitarian state, Kentucky is not a Baptist or a Presbyterian state. And if Palestine is to become a state at all, it will be better for the world's prospects of peace if it is made a Palestinian state, and not a Jewish one. If its political condition must conform to its preponderant group religion, it would probably be on a more stable basis if it were a Mohammedan state—little as Mohammedan states have contributed to the advance of culture and civilization. One might almost as well talk about erecting a Jewish state of Iowa or Missouri, as to talk of a Jewish state of Palestine. It could only be supported by force of arms, and the world is sick of that.

Zionism undoubtedly makes a potent appeal to the imagination, to the love of the romantic and the picturesque that lives in all persons of sentiment and active mental life. Palestine has been the home of two great religions, the Jewish and the Christian, and it has had great importance in the development of Mohammedanism. To Jerusalem many Mohammedans look as a city almost as sacred as Mecca and Medina. In the literature and the culture of Western Europe it has had a supreme position. For two centuries the chivalry of France, England, Flanders, Germany, Italy, and to some extent Spain and Portugal, fought to free it from its Turkish conquerors, and from those wars brought back to barbarous and uncultured peoples new ideas of civilization and the arts. One great crusade was diverted to the capture of Constantinople, and the culture of the Eastern empire was revealed to the wondering gaze of rough-handed fighting men that could not read or write. There has been magic and mystery and the most intense emotionalism in the thought of Palestine for ages. It has furnished the inspiration, not only for systems of worship, but for great human and democratic conceptions of politics and government. And when, in the 'eighties of the nineteenth century, Russian and Austrian persecution of Jews gave rise to the aspiration on the part of the persecuted to return to their old home and again be a nation, the impulse excited the sympathy of good people, Jewish and Christian, everywhere.

But like most matters of sentiment and enthusiasm, the project now appears impractical. Conditions change every day, and in two thousand years they change a great deal. The chicken does not go back into the egg. The whole number of Jews in the world approximates 15,000,000. They could not all go back to Palestine. The land would not support them, nor anywhere near that number. It is a poor land, mostly stones and sand and hot camel trails and a rather unpromising Arabian population which for centuries has been miserably misgoverned by the all-blighting Turks. But bad as Turkish misrule was, it was misrule by co-religionists of the great majority of the people. Under modern engineers the country might be considerably improved, but never to the extent of supporting a very much larger population than dwells there now. No disinterested financiers would pitch upon it as a highly favorable place for agricultural development. Since the Zionist movement began, about 10,000 Jews have gone there, and by their industry and executive ability, combined with some capital, they have greatly improved several sections and have even elevated the conditions of life for the Syrian and Arabian inhabitants about them. Employment conditions have been bettered, wages have increased, better dwellings have become the rule for Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans alike. But the growth that has taken place has not been capable of indefinite extension. The Palestine Foundation Fund had large and attractive plans for promoting immigration, agricultural improvement of all sorts, afforestation, drainage, irrigation, education, sanitation, and the development of electric power, all supported on a system of cooperative and mortgage banks. But capitalists did not come forward in any great numbers; and of the Jewish immigration, by far the larger part was labor, which the Arabs have bitterly resented on two grounds, one that it came from Eastern Europe and was tainted with Bolshevism, to which the Arabs have not yet learned to give their undivided love, and the other that it reduced the opportunity for employment, although the effect of the new Jewish penetration had been exactly the opposite. Like all human effort, the development, on the economic side, appears to have encountered the law of diminishing returns. On the social and political side it has encountered the religious rancor and intolerance that seem to pervert all thi-

Oriental, and from which we in this country are so nearly free in a practical political sense that it is difficult for the average American to understand why it has to be so seriously reckoned with in European and Asiatic politics.

It is fortunate that Zionism has not been made compulsory. Aside from the impossibility of making a small, semi-arid country of poor soil and climate, a country of about 10,000 square miles, or a little smaller than the state of Maryland, support 15,000,000 people, there are large numbers of those 15,000,000, especially in England and the United States, that do not appear to feel the need of any better national home than they have now. So the movement has encountered, not merely inertia, but active opposition, and not merely opposition among the Palestinians, but organized opposition among certain Jews in this country who believe it to be mischievous. We should find it difficult to imagine Mark Gerstle, or the Slosses, or Otto Kahn or Julius Kahn flocking to make their residences amid the sun-burnt wastes of Palestine or the dirt and diseases and night-howling dogs of modern Jerusalem.

The Jewish race has outgrown its old home. Its centres of culture are in the most advanced countries of the world, the powers of its genius are a contribution to all humanity. And that argues no weakening of fidelity to Jewish ideals and Jewish faith. The writer was once present at a Saturday meeting of the directorate of one of San Francisco's foremost civic organizations, when a member came in late and made this apology: "Gentlemen, I've just come from the synagogue. I felt that I couldn't be a good citizen unless I was first a good Jew, just as I feel that I can't be a good Jew unless I am a good citizen." That was Gustave Brenner. Such a spirit has little room for a double, that is to say a divided, allegiance; and from a "selfishly patriotic" point of view it would be a tragedy for any country now possessing that spirit to lose any of it to a Palestinian state, whether of mixed or purely Jewish elements.

The Mohammedan people of Palestine can hardly be blamed for their opposition to political Zionism. They claim that Palestine is their country, inherited for centuries, and that they are entitled to the employment and the profit there may be in its development. It is a short-sighted view, of course, for they have done little with the land since they have been domiciled there, and have actually profited, as we have said above, by such growth as Zionism has been able to promote. Nevertheless their attitude of obstruction is a very human one, and might have been expected. To them it is not as though Zionism had grown up within the country. It is something totally alien and they feel it is being forced on them from without. That makes it assume some of the aspects of invasion, and, peaceful though it may be, they do not purpose to submit peacefully to it. Their strongest religious feelings are involved. On this point Dr. Morris Jastrow says in his "Zionism and the Future of Palestine":

"In Jerusalem, in the cave under the sacred rock around which the chief mosque is built, the mark of Mohammed's head is shown. Day and night Mohammedans may be found in this cave seeking by prayer to Allah to obtain the merit that attaches to the sanctity of this spot. The rock represents the site of Solomon's Temple, but its sacred character antedates even the coming of the Hebrews by an indefinite number of centuries. The rock itself is a survival of primitive stone worship."

Considerations such as these seem far removed from the practical Western world of today, but they are still regnant in the Orient. Perhaps if it were proposed to make California a Buddhist state we should find ourselves not altogether free from them. They should form a serious part of the problems now being discussed by the Paris conference on conditions in the Near East. Unless that conference succeeds in making Zionism tolerable to the half-million Mohammedans of Palestine, or else in vastly modifying its nature and its aims, it will not have done a perfect piece of work.

MORTON TODD.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 29, 1922.

The ruined city of Ypres is being completely restored at a pace astounding to the hordes of American visitors who have passed that way bound for the south of France and the Algerian and Egyptian resorts. The Cloth Hall, that marvelous building of the age of guilds, is gradually assuming the light and delicate beauty which has made it rank with the loveliest of the medieval halls. But many of the Americans who have dropped by Ypres have been highly amused by the mayor's proclamation, in French and Flemish and then translated into only one foreign tongue, English, to the effect that the visitor is on holy ground, and that a stone or piece of gravel must not be removed, since all will again be gathered together in the rehabilitated structures.

London will not imitate New York in erecting skyscrapers, if the ideas of the Royal Institute of British Architects are carried out. The architects have voted against a report of their building acts committee advocating alteration of the London regulations to allow the erection of buildings 120 feet in height, instead of eighty feet, as at present.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Kitty Kiernan of Granard, County Longford, Ireland, affianced wife of Michael Collins, will make a very attractive first lady of the Irish Free State—to judge by her photos.

Marshal Foch recently attended the wedding of his niece in his native town, Tarbes, in the Pyrenees and was enrolled in the local veterans' association, after having refused honorary membership.

Captain Palazzoni, one of Italy's war heroes, who was wounded, mutilated, and decorated for valor, has started a newspaper having as its avowed object the vindication of ex-President Wilson's policy toward Italy.

"Lone Wolf" is the only Indian artist whose work is universally recognized. He has done more to visualize his people for the world than any other painter. His paintings of Indian subjects have been favorably mentioned both in American and European exhibitions.

Sir Arthur Balfour, as one must call him now, confesses that he was greatly embarrassed by American reporters. Our newspaper men expected typed copies of his speeches before they were delivered. Sir Arthur claims he never wrote out a speech in his life.

Edouard Belin, a French inventor, and discoverer of telephotography, has perfected an instrument for transmitting finger-prints by telegraph. Transmission of the prints requires only fifteen minutes. The telegraph will greatly reduce the chance of criminal escapes.

Miss Micheline Resco, a Parisian artist, has been selected by General Pershing to paint the portrait of himself that is to be the principal American exhibit in the Musée de l'Armée in Paris. The portrait is a gift of the Knights of Columbus in the name of the American people to the Fine Arts Ministry of France.

Professor Wesley Clair Mitchell has been appointed by the trustees of Columbia University to the chair of economics. Professor Mitchell has taught economics at the University of California, the University of Chicago, Harvard, and previously at Columbia. He is the author of several important works on economics.

The former Hungarian emperor, Charles, is reported to be in destitute circumstances in Madeira, unable to pay rent for his villa. Charles, it is said, now inhabits a very dilapidated house that lacks conveniences for his household. Hungarian legitimist followers of Charles have collected 2,000,000 crowns for his temporary relief.

Alice Hastings Bradley, daughter of the Herbert E. Bradleys of Chicago, is the youngest explorer of darkest Africa. Miss Bradley at the age of six accompanied the expedition of Dr. Carl E. Akeley of the American Museum of Natural History into the interior of the Belgian Congo. She was the first white child ever seen by the pigmy tribes.

Mayor John F. Hylan of New York was recently made a Commander of the Order of the Crown of Italy by Ambassador Ricci—the ceremony taking place in the mayor's reception room in the presence of a number of Italians. Mayor Hylan was decorated for services rendered Italians in New York City, where there are almost twice as many Italians as in Rome.

Ruth Muskrat, a young Indian girl of the Cherokee tribe, is chosen by her people to represent American Indians in a world's conference of men and women students from forty countries. The young delegate to the World's Student Christian Federation, whose conference meets in Peking this month, is part white and a student at the University of Kansas. Miss Muskrat is said to be well versed in the history of her nation. She is from that portion of the Cherokee tribe whose people were so ruthlessly driven West during the so-called "century of dishonor." From the time of Sir Walter Raleigh, the Cherokees have intermarried with the whites. They were the first Indian tribe to have a written language. It consisted of an alphabet of fifty-eight symbols and is still in use among the Indians. Miss Muskrat's trip has been made possible by the National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association.

Rear-Admiral George W. McElroy, general inspector of machinery for the bureau of steam engineering of the navy, stationed at Philadelphia, was recently retired for age. He has been in the service nearly forty-five years and has earned many honors, including advancement in grade for "eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle during the war with Spain." When Cervera's fleet tried to escape from Santiago Harbor on July 3, 1898, Commander Wainwright, on the Gloucester, once the late J. P. Morgan's yacht, waited until the Spanish armored ships, with which he could not cope, had come out, and then raced in toward the harbor entrance to attack the destroyers which followed the armorclads. The Gloucester, by reason of McElroy's skilful handling of her machinery, was largely responsible for driving all the destroyers ashore or sinking them. The rear-admiral was decorated with a Navy Cross for the successful conduct of important and responsible duty during the world war.

Viscount Peel, who has accepted the post declined by Lord Derby of Secretary for India, comes from a family of famous British politicians. His father, the first Viscount Peel, was considered one of the greatest speakers in the history of the House of Commons and his grandfather was Sir Robert Peel. The present viscount has had a notable political career himself, and like so many present-day politicians has had his fling at journalism. He acted as Daily Telegraph correspondent during the Græco-Turkish war, but was engrossed with weightier matters during the late war. He was colonel of the Bedfordshire Yeomanry, 1912-1915; chairman of the Committee on Detention of Neutral Vessels, 1916; joint parliamentary secretary to the National Service Department, 1917, and Under Secretary of State for War, 1919-1921. Viscount Peel is now Minister of Transport and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but neither office entitles him to sit with the cabinet. He will resign the transport post to accept the secretaryship.

Burro.

Belovéd vagrant of the ample ear;
Philosopher; gray hobo of the dunes;
Delight of children; thistle-chewing seer,
From Lebanon and eld, how many moons?

Muse of mañana; sturdy foe of haste,
Complacent in your poise, your attitude;
A statue of dejection, shaggy-faced,
Or plodding with your pack of cedar wood;

Pausing to turn your head, with motion stiff,
As though you half-imagined something wrong;
Wondering if you were there, complete, or if
The rest of you forgot to come along.

What melancholy thoughts bestir your breast,
When, like an ancient pump, you lift a tone,
Lose it and lift another, with a zest
Known to no beast on earth save you alone?

Your melody means something deep, unseen,
A storied mem'ry of some old Romance,
And ears attuned to mysteries, might glean
More from your song than simple assonance.

You sing the Truth, without a touch of guile,
And Truth were sad enough—and yet your guise
Of March-mad melancholy moves a smile,
And thus the world is richer, burro-wise:

Richer, because you are yourself; you please
That subtle sense that loves the ludicrous,
Scorning no lesson. Oh, Demosthenes

Dogging the sunlight of some empty street
Content with what your indolence may find—
Let the world rock, and you will keep your feet;
Let the world run, and you will stray behind.

Night.

Swiftly walk over the western wave,
Spirit of Night!
Out of the misty eastern cave,—
Where, all the long and lone daylight,
Thou wovest dreams of joy and fear
Which make thee terrible and dear,—
Swift be thy flight!

Wrap thy form in a mantle grey,
Star-inwrought!
Blind with thine hair the eyes of Day;
Kiss her until she be wearied out,
Then wander o'er city and sea and land,
Touching all with thine opiate wand—
Come, long-sought!

When I arose and saw the dawn,
I sigh'd for thee;
When light rode high, and the dew was gone,
And noon lay heavy on flower and tree,
And the weary Day turn'd to her rest,
Lingering like an unloved guest,
I sigh'd for thee.

Thy brother Death came, and cried,
"Wouldst thou me?"
Thy sweet child Sleep, the filmy-eyed,
Murmur'd like a noontide bee,
"Shall I nestle near thy side?
Wouldst thou me?"—And I replied,
"No, not thee!"

Death will come when thou art dead,
Soon, too soon—
Sleep will come when thou art fled,
Of neither would I ask the boon
I ask of thee, beloved Night—
Swift be thine approaching flight,
Come soon, soon!—Percy Bysshe Shelley.

I Do Not Love Thee.

I do not love thee!—no! I do not love thee!
And yet when thou art absent I am sad;
And envy even the bright blue sky above thee,
Whose quiet stars may see thee and be glad.

I do not love thee!—yet, I know not why,
Whate'er thou dost seems still well done, to me:
And often in my solitude I sigh
That those I do love are not more like thee!

I do not love thee!—yet, when thou art gone,
I hate the sound (though those who speak be dear)
Which breaks the lingering echo of the tone
Thy voice of music leaves upon my ear.

I do not love thee!—yet thy speaking eyes,
With their deep, bright, and most expressive blue,
Between me and the midnight heaven arise,
Often than any eyes I ever knew.

I know I do not love thee! yet, alas!
Others will scarcely trust my candid heart;
And oft I catch them smiling as they pass,
Because they see me gazing where thou art.
—Caroline Elizabeth Sarah Norton.

A GREAT CITIZEN.

Charles A. Murdock Contributes to Local History a Study of Horatio Stebbins.

It would be of great social value if some method could be devised to induce Charles A. Murdock to write more books. Perhaps the best method would be for the public to buy generously those he does write. His richness of life and experience, the results of his lofty outlook over men and events, should have permanent record and indefinite multiplication through print, as a leaven of good. And when he devotes his pen to such a subject as Horatio Stebbins, he makes an invaluable contribution to the treasures of local tradition.

The subject of Mr. Murdock's latest volume is his intimate friend, the successor to Thomas Starr King in the Unitarian ministry of San Francisco. Dr. Stebbins was born on a Massachusetts farm over a hundred years ago; on August 8, 1821. He died at Cambridge, Massachusetts, almost twenty years ago; on April 11, 1902. From 1864 to 1900, a period of thirty-five years, he not only filled his pulpit in San Francisco, but he occupied the position of a great citizen, a moderating, conserving, and humanizing influence in a rapidly changing community that sorely needed steadfast guides for its social and ethical life.

Massachusetts and the Puritan stock was just the combination that gives spine and purpose to character. The old Bay State is the sort of cold, rugged country that turns out men like Samuel Adams and Daniel Webster. They took things seriously there, and the seriousness often appeals to our author, who knew the land well, for it was his own birthplace, as whimsically humorous. Of the community of Wilbraham, where the Stebbins family had long resided, he gives this sharp, New England picture:

The location of the meeting-house was a stirring issue. It was six years before Wigwam Hill triumphed, and it was twelve years before this site was accepted, the church built, and all the gallery seats were installed.

What could a mere German tyrant on an English throne expect to do with a lot of hard-heads like that? There could be no question on which side of the struggle for independence such people would be found. Says Mr. Murdock:

The community was intensely loyal to the cause of the colonies. In 1774 a pledge against purchasing or consuming goods imported from Great Britain was signed by one hundred and twenty-five determined men, ten of whom bore the name of Stebbins. In 1775 the call from Lexington was promptly answered by a company of volunteers. Another company rallied at Bennington to the relief of Gates. At least ten of the Stebbins family served in the Continental army. In church matters the family was interested, but independent. In 1805, when a petition for a Methodist Episcopal Church was presented to the town, thirteen of the proponents signed the name of Stebbins, and several of the same name signed a protest against it.

From such an ancestry and in such a community Horatio Stebbins was born on August 8, 1821, of the eighth generation of his American family. His father was a well-to-do farmer, a man of good mind but limited education. He was just and upright, respected by his neighbors. In his family relations he united gentleness and wise severity. He made his son a companion.

Persons afraid of work would have had little opportunity even to survive in such an environment, and it was thus that young Stebbins grew up:

Next to the family and the home comes the influence of community life and customs. It was almost a hundred years ago, and there was far less relaxation from Puritan severity than we find today. There was far greater simplicity, and a rigor we know little. Life was a serious business. To make a living, simple though it was, was not easy, and hard work was a necessary habit of existence. Happiness, if reached, depended little on self-indulgence. Accumulations of wealth were infrequent, amusements few, and pleasure hardly expected. Frivolity was frowned upon as something that could not be afforded. Economy was a part of the atmosphere, and extended to the expression of affection. The church loomed large as a part of life, and, although its standards were narrow and its demands rigid, it nurtured strong characters. Waste did not weaken and luxury did not corrupt. The difficulty of getting anything spurred effort, and vigorous effort generated the strength required to accomplish purpose.

Horatio Stebbins received his degree at Harvard in 1848. His friend Horace Davis, ten years younger, graduated in 1849. It may be inferred that the nine years' priority represents about the time taken to overcome the handicap of having to earn his own way. How much it added to the fibre of his character can not possibly be shown, but no one could know Dr. Stebbins without feeling that his strength and independence had been largely fostered by his circumstances.

Years afterward Dr. Stebbins wrote his son:

When I was a youth, I worked in the open field: I often felt that it was hard, and I longed to be free; but when I began to study, I found that hard, and it seemed to me that to work with my muscles or the bare earth would be a rest! A noble self-direction always requires firmness, and often it requires fortitude. It requires more energy to lead a true student life than it does to pile up stones in the field, or to weed corn in the heat of the sun. You have not been situated as I was, but I hope you will get as much discipline of will and purpose in academic life as I got in rustic labors. Concentration is the soul of discipline.

Not many years after his graduation Horatio Stebbins received a call to preach at Portland, Maine, and was in the ministry there when the civil war broke out. To him it was a moral issue, and one that might with the greatest propriety be brought into the life of a church. He did not hesitate. Says his biographer:

At the opening of the civil war trying problems presented themselves, and there was constant need for prompt decision on new issues. Men were troubled, for the heavens were dark, and they were called to act where they were in doubt. On the Sunday following the fall of Fort Sumter, the congregation found the pulpit draped with the American flag. It disturbed and shocked some of the more conservative. They had never seen a flag in a church, and they felt that it was out of place. They thought the minister indiscreet, and promptly warned him of the danger in raising an issue that had nothing to do with religion. He had counted the cost, but his religion included loyalty to country, and the flag remained, with its full significance.

He had no narrow views of "churchianity." To him, religion was vital and the church was a living thing, and he once stated this conception of it:

The office of the Christian church, as I understand it, is to stimulate personal character and life to moral and spiritual excellence, and to cherish those revering sentiments toward God in which all excellence at last has its root. It is not primarily to engage the soul in the work of its own salvation, but to engage it rather in a free, abounding human life. Progressive apprehension of spiritual truth, the nature of man, duty, and destiny, is the keynote of human welfare. To have an idea of the meaning of this world and to respect it, to study its wants and apply the principles of righteousness and human charity to life and experience, and to find the kingdom of heaven in the helpful and hopeful conditions of earthly existence, in short, to befriend whatever is human, this is the office of a Christian church. It is not the office of the church to reflect public opinion, like the press, but to show the pattern forever in the mount, and that moral and spiritual ideals are the glory of the world.

If the church survives, it will be because she is inspired and guided by the spirit of truth that will lead her to all truth; and all truth is unity, not of opinion, but of heart and will.

The Kentucky legislators who recently came within one vote of excluding the teaching of evolution from the educational system of their state might think that over.

While Dr. Stebbins was in the Portland ministry, California was being guided politically aright, as to the dark issue of secession, by Thomas Starr King, or Starr King as he was more generally called, the great Unitarian divine whose matchless oratory probably did more than any other one thing to hold the state in the Union. Starr King was loyal San Francisco's pride. To the present writer, at least, his name was beautiful, and suggested that of a race horse, with connotations of brilliance and velocity. He was not an easy man to succeed, but when he died Dr. Stebbins was chosen to take his place. It was a most difficult succession, for the Stebbins personality appears still to have retained that economy in expressions of affection which had become the habit of the New England farmers. The warmth and love that animated him were apt to kindle within rather than in the effusive, outward Western way. But his dependable goodness and real humanity won, as they were sure to do. He had a deep and almost prophetic insight into public affairs, one instance of which must be cited:

Dr. Stebbins was soon in demand for addresses before various organizations. He rested satisfied with no perfunctory performance, but always had something of real value to say, worth the hearing. The Society of California Pioneers rejoice in and glorify the past, harking back to the early days and felicitating themselves on their pioneering. In September, 1865, he addressed them and said, among other things well to heed:

"Nothing can save us from Spanish decline and Mexican littleness but communication with the world, that rapid and sure intercourse with human society which assimilates the interests of mankind. We must boldly affirm this, not in lugubrious strain of croaking, but as the firm ground of our hopes concerning the growth and prosperity of our state, namely, that the powers that have made her prosperity thus far have done their best, and that no great impulse of human affairs denoting permanent progress can be felt here, until the great highways are opened over sea and land, and the world—the many-sided industries, arts, commerce, and literature—is imparted to us."

His fund of sympathy seemed deep as the sea, his charity for human weakness inexhaustible:

His people were never scolded for what they failed to do, nor prodded to immediate action. He was long-minded and patient. Nothing excited him to passionate denunciation or frenzied appeal. He never stormed at sinners, but he could be appropriately severe and never failed uncompromisingly to denounce wrong. His gospel was the reality and supremacy of the spirit, the integrity of the universe, and the beauty of holiness. He was fearless and free. He respected man and he trusted God. He sought abundant life, and he walked humbly, in faithfulness and honor. He commanded complete respect and confidence, and as time went on he gained a firm hold on the affections of his parishioners and the regard of the community.

Stebbins was most democratic, and his democracy was of the heart and the feelings, based on the Christian conception of the brotherhood of man. This passage recalls Carlyle's statement in his "French Revolution," demonstrating the advent of democracy; that a cab driver might thenceforth challenge a duke:

I remember that once, when he returned from an Eastern trip, I inquired how he was impressed by a man whom I knew he had met. He shook his head as he said: "I was disappointed in him; I heard him speak discourteously to a cab-driver." He was a consistent democrat, always considerate and kindly, and so it happened that not a man who ever sawed wood for him, or drove his hack, or checked his baggage, failed to be his admiring friend.

It is not to be supposed that any man of such insight into life would fail to see the fun in it or be himself without the humorous emotion. These are good stories of him:

He was friendly with a contractor, who had been greatly perplexed over a lawsuit brought against him in connection with the construction of one of the buildings of the University of California. Mr. George A. Nourse, a trusted parishioner, was attorney for the contractor, who poured out a tale of woe. Dr. Stebbins listened patiently, and then, placing his hand on his friend's shoulder, said: "Never mind! Nourse and I will stick to you as long as you have a cent."

The story may lose in the telling, but the answer did not fail in its purpose.

He found the Yosemite Valley tremendously impressive, but I think that he enjoyed two touches of human nature still more. One discovery was a stage-driver, a real character who evidently reciprocated the interest he aroused. Dr. Stebbins shared the front seat with him, and they "talked horse" almost exclusively. A remark of Mr. Horace Davis disclosed the fact that his companion was a clergyman, whereat the driver turned and asked, "Are you a minister?" The doctor replied, "Yes, that's what I am when I'm at home." "Well," rejoined the driver, "I don't know what kind of a preacher you are, but there's a damned good horseman spoiled."

The other was the "remarks" of a tourist in an ancient hotel register. As I remember, it modestly read something like this: "John Studebaker, South Bend, Indiana, president of Studebaker Brothers, who manufacture twenty-four complete wagons every day; six hundred every month; seventy-two hundred every year!—And yet this is nothing, compared with the wonders of the Almighty as displayed in the Yosemite Valley."

Aside from his stimulating, tonic example of good citizenship, California owes Dr. Stebbins more than it could ever repay any man for his work in basing its public educational system on the broadest foundations of intellectual freedom. His own soul could tolerate no narrowness. Not so much what a man believed, but what he lived, was the important thing to him. Of his attitude toward other creeds than his the author says:

Dr. Stebbins was never disposed to unsettle those whose religious convictions or theological opinions differed from his own. He encouraged no one to come to us with large expectations, or to hasten out of orthodoxy until he felt that he must. He deplored the loss that often resulted when the old faith was given up before the new was firmly established, and the misconception on the part of the unripe as to what it means to be a liberal. On his return from a trip to Oregon, he remarked that he found men whose only idea of liberalism was that it allowed a man to shoot ducks on Sunday.

As to his services to education, the record runs:

Dr. Stebbins early became interested in the College of California, which graduated its first class, three in number, in 1864, the year he came. It was located in Oakland, and represented large hopes. On June 7, 1865, he addressed a meeting of the alumni, and the next year he delivered the Commencement oration. In the newspaper English of the period it was pronounced "brief, pertinent, philosophical, effectively delivered, and warmly applauded."

He became a member of the board of trustees, and later was elected president of the board. He was influential in transferring the organization and property to the state as the foundation for the University of California, subsequently located at Berkeley. He was appointed a regent for the state, and was reappointed from time to time until he had served continuously for twenty-six years. He was not, himself, a minute scholar, but he knew the means of scholarship and was without doubt completely equipped for leadership in formulating and sustaining a really great university. The other members of the board deferred to him with advantage to the cause.

In considering Dr. Stebbins' contribution to the cause of education in California, one may well speak here of his interest in Stanford University, founded some twelve years later than the period covered in this chapter, but carrying forward the same convictions of the worth of study and culture. He contributed in many important ways to its formation and administration. He was a trusted friend of both Senator and Mrs. Stanford, and they often consulted him. From the nature of things he could not take an active part in details, but he could and did give frequent counsel. He retained his position on the board of trustees until his removal to New England. He took part in many public occasions there, and the university and the splendid gift that made it possible were the subject of notable addresses.

President Charles W. Eliot referred to his great service to the state, saying that he had done more than could be estimated to give the California universities the place they occupy among the educational institutions of the land and to shape their present standards. As a result of his presence it is everywhere understood that these universities are built on freedom of thought.

Such a mind grows at times grandly prophetic. Could Dr. Stebbins have lived until 1914 he would not more clearly have discovered the factors that threw the world into confusion than he evidently did in 1898, just at the close of the war with Spain, when he wrote as follows to the American Ambassador in Berlin:

"HON. ANDREW D. WHITE: I thank, heartily for your speech at Leipzig on the Fourth of June, united with that for wisdom, discretion, and indies the courteous felicity of expression which such delicacy that we, here at Your position has been forest in your conduct, and it is a home, have felt a lively satisfaction that our confidence source of great anguish. Your speech displays the quality has been abundant politician, a wise statesman, a statesman of a disposition of freedom. The touchy spirit of independence has, in some minds, excited evil forebodings; man's decision. You have ignored these extremes, by the in of right reason, and the manners of a prince of liberty. That is a singular felicity of speech where you give our cause such historic setting: 'The struggle of a new era of right against an old era of wrong.' The war was inevitable; it is over: my only desire now is that diplomacy may be so wise and so honorable that statesmen may believe in one another in all national efforts to promote the welfare of humankind. Bismarck is dead! The heavens do not weep; nor is there a ripple of grief in the heart of man. A statesman so bereft of great human nature as to think of founding a modern state without principles of individual liberty does not attract the applause nor the gratitude of the world."

There is no space here to dwell upon the intimacies between our fellow-citizen, Mr. Murdock, and this fine exemplar of citizenship, his friend and pastor through thirty-five long years. The record is an admiring one, as it well might be, for Horatio Stebbins left a deep impression on the life of California. He was a most worthy successor to Starr King, and this is a better and stronger community today because he lived in it. But in addition to this subject, we need another book from Charles A. Murdock. San Francisco can not have too many.

HORATIO STEBBINS, HIS MINISTRY AND PERSONALITY. By Charles A. Murdock. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending March 25, 1922, were $122,500,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $130,000,000; a decrease of $7,500,000.

The present activity in building operations is an outstanding feature of the general business situation. The building industry in the United States is second in importance only to agriculture and many million workmen directly and indirectly are dependent upon it. In the more active building sections of the country that are systematically reported, com-investment, has not expanded correspondingly.

Despite the handicap of high costs, home-building activity is being maintained for the present because the housing necessity compels it, even on the basis of uneconomical investments. Public building and construction are also being done on a high cost basis which will be reflected in high tax rates for years to come. Public building, like residence building, can not continue indefinitely under these conditions.

Labor itself is the chief sufferer in the situation. Resistance by important classes of labor to wage declines in a period of declining prices disorganizes the entire productive organization of the country and contributes to unemployment in other lines. The maintenance of building operations on high wage levels delays general wage readjustment. It means exorbitant rents and prohibitive costs for homes for workmen. It is a general deterrent to a return to normal industrial, commercial, and financial activity.

On the whole labor costs in the building field are not greatly reduced from their maximum. Transportation is a very large part of the laid-down cost of building materials and the adjustment of railroad rates is deferred by the refusal of railway labor to recognize that the period of war wages is over. In other words, high building costs are being maintained directly and indirectly by labor costs. It is there that the fundamental correction must be made.

The world's immediate needs for investment capital must be largely supplied by the United States and prosperity within the country will be dependent upon its making sound investments in foreign markets as much as upon finding foreign markets for its goods. The recent marked increase in foreign securities flotations in New York signalizes the growing importance of America's position as an international lender. For many years before the war, the annual total volume of new domestic and foreign securities placed within the United States was normally about twice that of any other single country.

The war diverted the course of international finance from established channels and increased the needs and borrowings of other nations from the American market, but the developments under peace conditions would have been along similar lines.

America will not have matters all her own way in world finance. There is severe competition ahead. Improving money conditions abroad, particularly in London, where there has been a marked lowering of rates, will increase effective rivalry with this country. The favorable position of the dollar among the currencies of the world has made foreign borrowings here particularly advantageous in the past few years, but as the premium on the dollar declines this advantage will be reduced. International competition demands the further development in America of sound foreign investment experience and judgment.

Improvement in business with increased stability in underlying conditions characterized the period from February 16th to March 15th. Prices of the major commodities have shown only normal fluctuations. Many lines of industry give evidence of increased activity and there appears to have been some decrease in industrial unemployment. Retail trade over the country is reported as unsatisfactory, but mail order houses generally show an increase in business, attributable to the improved purchasing power and mental attitude of the farmer, due to the rise in agricultural prices.

Wholesale trade is generally reported to be better, although a considerable degree of caution wisely prevails. The rate of iron and steel production has increased, but the volume of forward orders still remains restricted. Immediate demand for boots and shoes is less active and other sections of the hide and leather trade continue to lag. The cotton textile situation is handicapped by strikes in the New England cotton mills. Wool manufacture is operating at a fair rate, although the demand for woolen and worsted fabrics has been disappointing. There has been a marked increase of activity in the manufacture of automobiles, tires, and accessories. Car loadings have increased materially during recent weeks. Exports are at a low level, but this is normally the season of a light export movement. Business failures have declined in number since the beginning of the year. The past month has shown improvement in fundamental conditions, and consequently in business sentiment, as has been the case each month since midsummer of 1921. The period of extreme discouragement in the United States has now passed and there is widespread and justified confidence in the long future.

The marked decrease in the demand for iron and steel products which developed in the midsummer of 1920 continued until the early fall of 1921, when there was some improvement. As stated in the annual report of the United States Steel Corporation for last year the subsidiary companies carried forward into 1921 a substantial tonnage of orders for steel products. This enabled them to operate at an average of somewhat over 70 per cent. of capacity during the first quarter. The degree of operations dropped in succeeding months and reached the low point for the year in July, when the output was only about 29 per cent. The average production for the entire year in rolled and other finished products for sale was 47.5 per cent. of capacity, the lowest ratio of production to capacity in any year since the organization of the corporation. Concurrently with the decrease in demand for steel products there were marked declines in the prices obtained for nearly all classes of the same. These price reductions as a

High freight rates due to labor conditions and high wages to labor are the controlling factors in building costs. They maintain construction prices at levels that interfere with the full and well-rounded development of building operations. They also serve to inject an element of fixed inflation into this, the rule exceeded the decreases it was possible to effect in the cost of production through the reduction in unit prices of factors entering into cost of operations and the exercise of rigid economies. A number of elements in the cost of producing steel show little if any recession from war-time figures, notably that of railroad transportation, which on a basis of existing rate conditions averages in the case of the subsidiary companies upwards of 40 per cent. of the total cost of producing steel. At the close of the year the prices prevailing for some products were below the cost of production. Since the beginning of 1922, and to the date of writing this report, the new orders received have been equal to about one-half the total capacity of the plants of the subsidiary companies.

A minister in New Jersey recently received and sent in to this magazine a circular offering stock based on a "newly patented self-feeding, refillable toothbrush," says the World's Work. The opening paragraph of this circular read:

"Would you invest $100 or more now in an article that you thought better from a standpoint of financial returns than the Gillette Safety Razor, which stock is reputed to be worth $22,000 for every $100 originally invested?"

It closed with the other most universally used piece of ammunition of the get-rich-quick promoter—the hurry-hurry warning, designed to make the prospect send in his money before he has time to reflect or make an investigation. Here is that paragraph:

"If you have funds for immediate investment mail the below today—otherwise don't bother. Thirty days from now will be too late for the 50 per cent. bonus. This is one of those real opportunities every one dreams of, but only those who have courage enough to back their own opinion profit by."

The only date on this circular was "February, 1922," so it would be impossible to tell when the thirty days was up. The promoter did not want to miss any subscriptions, however, because the prospect might think the time had expired. Probably that same circular is now being sent to a different "sucker list," dated "March, 1922." The other arguments of this "self-feeding, refillable toothbrush" circular were ludicrous, but attention in this article is directed to a serious consideration of that one argument which is used so effectively in appealing to the cupidity of human nature.

This argument, in its final analysis, is: "Because Henry Ford and a few others made a success in the automobile field, this new company will also be a great success; because Gillette was successful in the manufacture and marketing of a special article, every stranger who has a patent on an article that might be used by the public is worth backing with your money."

This argument, as applied to the automobile field, is about the same as saying that because a few of the men who went to the Klondike in 1898 came back with fortunes, a man could go up there now and strike it rich. As applied to safety razors and self-feeding toothbrushes, it is the same as saying that because gold was discovered in Alaska it will be discovered in one's back yard.

The promoter, however, maintains the truth of his statements of these enormous profits of the past, and the credulous investor supplies the connecting reasoning that induces him to send in his money for the new promotion. The promoter does not have to say that his company is going to do as well. He simply supplies the "truth" and lets the cupidity of human nature do the rest. But his "truth" is not the whole truth, and an examination of these statements with that in mind should be enlightening to the investor.

In the first place, there were two Ford companies that passed out of existence before the present Ford Motor Company was organized. In the earliest of these, ex-Mayor Maybury of Detroit and some of his friends lost all the money they put up. When the present company was formed, Mr. A. Y. Malcolmson, who had backed Ford in his experimental work, got a block of stock; two lawyers who drew the incorporation papers each put in $5000 and took stock, and Mr. John S. Grey, a Detroit capitalist, was induced to put in some money. The company had $28,000 cash capital to start with. The Dodge brothers built a factory to manufacture the first Ford cars and also took stock in the company. Never was any Ford Motor Company stock offered to the public, and it is safe to conclude that Ford would not have had the mechanical and business genius that has accounted for the success of his company if he had offered the stock to the public, or permitted it to be offered, by pointing out the success which the International Harvester Company had enjoyed in manufacturing machinery to expand the productive capacity of the farmer.

Much the same story could be told about the early days of the other companies, from which time the returns shown by this promoter have been reckoned. It would be more to the point and much more honest if those of his kind would show what profits might have been made from the time these stocks were first available to the public, but it would not serve their purpose as well. And that would still be grossly misleading, for it would be only half of that story. The other half is the part the investor should inquire about.

General Motors stock, for instance, since it has been available to the public, has shown a remarkable advance in market price, but subsequently it has suffered a severe decline. If one had gotten in at the lowest price at which he could have bought it and if he had sold it at the highest in 1920, a return of $45,000 on $500 would have been realized. On the other hand, if an investor got in at the high point of 1920 he would have only $95 left today out of $500. In the case of the Saxon and the Chalmers Motors both of these companies have had to go through reorganizations in which their original stockholders have been called upon for assessments and their stock is now worth very little.

The truth is that if a man had "invested"—to use the promoter's word—$500 in every motor company that has lived, died, or been a still-born promotion, at the lowest prices at which he could have secured the stock, he would now have enough worthless stock certificates to paper a hall, and the return that he would be getting on the few that are paying dividends would be only a drop as compared to the bucket of interest he might be enjoying if he had bought only high-grade bonds. He would have secured no Ford Motor stock to offset part of his losses.

And if all the millionaires of the country had "invested" $500 in every promotion proposition of every kind that has made use of the methods here described, they would be subjects for public charity today. The underlying truth is that new propositions of merit do not make use of these methods.

The government of Canada is in serious danger of having its credit destroyed by its railroad policy.

The railways owned by the Dominion of Canada failed in 1921 by about $20,000,000 to earn enough to pay their operating expenses.

To this must be added about $100,000,000 for interest on the investment which was not earned.

Therefore, directly and indirectly, government ownership of the railways last year added to the burdens of the Canadian taxpayer around $120,000,000.

The deficit officially admitted by the Canadian government for 1920 was over $70,000,000, but this did not include interest on a large part of the railways.

J. L. Payne, former controller of statistics of the Department of Railways and Canals, estimated the total losses, direct and indirect, in 1920 at about $136,000,000.

The railway deficit of Canada is becoming an extremely serious thing. Canada has only nine million people and the Dominion government has an annual revenue of only about $450,000,000.

Government railway deficits were incurred by the railways of the United States in 1918 and 1919 under government operation.

Since the government guarantees to the railroads of the United States were withdrawn they have incurred losses, but the taxpayers have not had to pay them.—Industrial News Bureau.

The offering by Bond & Goodwin and Bond & Goodwin & Tucker, Inc., of $500,000 Western Meat Company first mortgage ten-year 7 per cent. sinking fund gold bonds marks one of the most important pieces of local industrial financing which has been arranged this year.

The Western Meat Company has been engaged in the meat-packing business in California since 1894, and is widely known in business and livestock circles throughout most of California, Nevada, and southern Oregon. The Swift and Morris interests of Chicago are among the principal stockholders.

These bonds will constitute the only funded debt of the company and will be a direct first mortgage on all of the real property of the company, including its plants and equipment in San Francisco, South San Francisco, Oakland, San Jose, Sacramento, and Fresno, and all the capital stock of the South San Francisco Union Stock Yards Company.

The property of the company applicable to this mortgage, plus actual cost of additions up to December 31, 1921, has been appraised at $2,700,690, or more than five times the amount of the bonds now offered.

Gross earnings of $1,235,641.13 of Cities Service Company for February, 1922, were approximately the same as the earnings for the preceding month, although February earnings were for but twenty-eight days comparing with thirty-one days for January. After providing for all expenses and interest, the balance for the month was $1,022,183.40, which, after charging preferred dividends, left a balance available for reserves, common stock, and surplus of $613,433.05. For the twelve months ending February 28, 1922, gross earnings of Cities Service Company were $12,863,346.71, with net after expenses and interest of $10,269,663.16. After charging requirements for preferred dividends, there was a balance for reserves, common stock, and surplus for the twelve months of $5,399,212.31. Requirements for payment of preferred dividends for the twelve months were earned 2.11 times, with $11.66 earned per share on the average amount of common stock outstanding for the period. As of March 10, 1922, total reserves and surplus of Cities Service Company were $48,815,052.60.

President Harding's newspaper, the Marion (Ohio) Daily Star, has the following to say editorially about municipal or public ownership of public utilities:

"The municipal shop of Chicago, built and equipped by the city at a cost of $2,700,000, have ceased to operate as municipal institutions. Under municipal ownership repairs

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The week from April 2d to 8th is "Religious Book Week," according to an announcement from the Religious Book Week Committee. Either, coincidentally, because it is Lent, or out of deference for the committee's plans, most of the publishing houses are bringing out books of a religious nature. President Harding has stamped the movement with his approval. He endorses the programme "with pleasure." E. P. Dutton & Co., always among the most earnest and gracious of the great publishers, have produced a book especially for the occasion. And it is a happy coincidence that the American publication of the latest of "A Gentleman with a Duster's" books also coincides with this week. For, logically enough, "A Gentleman with a Duster" has turned from triumphs of political and social exposures to an illuminating survey of the modern church and its exponents.

Boni & Liveright announce a book by that delightful historian, Dr. Van Loon, called "The Story of the Bible," which chimes in tune with the Easter spirit. If "The Story of the Bible" measures up to Dr. Van Loon's "The Story of Mankind"—and we shall be cruelly disappointed if it does not—it will be a book to cherish. In fact there is a crying need in our superficial age for a Bible shorn of its formidableness. We have grown used to following the line of least resistance; our generation from infancy up has had things made easy for it. It is now high time some one made the Bible easy. Dr. Van Loon's intention was, he says, "to tell my boys what they want to know, to answer their questions and make them familiar with the story and the characters of the world's most remarkable book, a book which has influenced in countless ways a large section of humanity." Some of the most daring books written incidentally, including "Alice in Wonderland," have been written for the author's children. Dr. Van Loon's object only enhances our anxiety to read "The Story of the Bible." But we venture to prophesy that, like "Alice in Wonderland," Dr. Van Loon's new book will be read fully as much if not more by adults who have never been able to overcome the somewhat terrifying aspect of the Bible itself.

A book for the more venturesome is "The Evolution of the New Testament," by the Rev. J. E. Symes (E. P. Dutton & Co.), but one would want to be a more intrepid biblical scholar than most of us are to tackle that. It is nevertheless an invaluable reference book, as it reveals all that is known of New Testament authors, states the order and circumstances under which the books were written and how they have come to occupy their unique position among Christian writings. The volume has many notes and a truly exhaustive bibliography.

More important to the average reader is a book by a Florentine writer, the Baron Friedrich von Hügel. "Essays and Addresses on the Philosophy of Religion" (E. P. Dutton & Co.) is especially dedicated by its publishers to religious book week. Like the Bible, the baron's book is apt to show a redoubtable front. In reality it is one of the easiest to read of books—as I believe many maintain the Bible is. Emphasis should be made on the word "philosophy" in the title. These papers are preeminently philosophical and are in fact remarkable for a clear, logical lucidity too often lacking in even the most scholarly of philosophical writings. The baron's English, for it is evidently his, is not only distinguished, it is perfectly idiomatic. Some of the papers were first delivered in Italian, but there is no trace of the translation about them. The book is a piece of masterly English and a genuine contribution to philosophical thought. Though written by a churchman, it is neither controversial nor pious. It is reminiscent of the pellucid style and sweet reasonableness of John Henry Newman.

Another timely contribution to the Lent book season is "The Crisis of the Churches," by Leighton Parks (Charles Scribner's Sons). Dr. Parks, who is rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, has treated his subject broadly. The crisis of the churches is the world's crisis. The text, church unity will be of interest to every church member in the country.

It is safe to predict that of our little quota of religious books here, "Painted Windows," by "A Gentleman with a Duster" (G. P. Putnam's Sons), will be the most widely read and discussed. "A Gentleman with a Duster" has an even more swinging opportunity for satire than hitherto. In "Painted Windows"—our anonymous author retains his happy headline facility for titles—the dry-cleaning author "reveals the chaos of opinion which disturbs the modern church." Evidently his theme is identical with that of Dr. Parks mentioned above. Having read neither, we are perfectly unprejudiced. But it would be interesting to read them comparatively. "Painted Windows" will be treated in the review columns of the Argonaut later. Meanwhile I venture to guess that the "bold book" of the dusting gentleman presents in a more sensational manner the same desperate exposé that the rector of St. Bartholomew's gives in all seriousness as the status quo of modern religion. ## Notes of Books and Authors.

An unpublished Mark Twain poem has been sent in to the great humorist's publishers, the Harpers, by Mrs. E. B. C. Hanington of Kimberley, British Columbia. In an accompanying letter Mrs. Hanington explained that the poem was written for her son, who was at that time just a youngster. She inclosed the manuscript, which is in Mark Twain's own handwriting and hilarious with his characteristic humor, authorizing the publishers to print the poem if they saw fit. The Harpers, realizing the great value of the little poem, have sent it on to the Mark Twain estate, where it will be held until the return from Europe of Mark Twain's official biographer, Albert Bigelow Paine.

G. K. Chesterton is at present engaged on three different new books—the much-heralded American impressions, a complete edition of his verse, and "Eugenics and Other Evils." One can imagine G. K.'s glee at the ample opportunities afforded him by the last title.

Mrs. Hodgson Burnett has just finished a new novel, "The Head of the House of Coombe." It is thirty-five years since she captured the English-speaking world with "Little Lord Fauntleroy."

There is a far-sighted tradition among English writers, which we suspect originated among Scotch writers, to attach themselves to publishing houses. The advantages are manifest. But whether they land the job as a result of a successful book or whether they publish the book as a result of the job is not quite clear. Mr. J. D. Beresford is reader for Messrs. Collins. Mr. Michael Sadleir of "Privilege" fame is on Messrs. Constable's staff. Mr. Frank Swinnerton and Mr. Geoffrey Whithworth are on the staff of Messrs. Chatto and Winders.

A translation of "La Feu," by Henri Barbusse, is being widely read by the German working class.

The Oxford University Press American Branch has nearly ready two volumes of essays or lectures—"Wiltshire Essays," by Maurice Hewlett, and "The Problem of Style," by J. Middleton Murry.

"Etruscan Tomb Paintings: Their Subjects and Significance" is a copiously illustrated volume by Frederick Poulsen of Copenhagen, which the American Branch of the Oxford Press is about to publish.

Edgar Lee Masters' novel, "Children of the Market Place," is announced by the Macmillan Company. Mr. Masters writes: "My book is a study of the country between 1833 and 1900, built around Stephen Douglas, who was intensely American, who watched with jealous eyes the diplomacy of England and strove to defeat it in the interests of his own country. It is a study, too, in the defeat of Douglas, a character of the Titan type, who ran counter to the will of Zeus, the world spirit. The name of Lincoln does not occur in the book until almost the end. This is an artistic symbol of the fact that for nearly twenty years before Lincoln was known Douglas was the most famous statesman of America."

In a "Musical Tour Through the Land of the Past," recently published by the Holts, Romain Rolland pays a visit to Samuel Pepys, devoting an entire chapter to that famous diarist's unconquerable penchant for music. Rolland ransacks the "Diary," which he considers a barometer of English musical taste about the year 1660, and brings out many amusingly ingenious passages. He pokes gentle fun at Pepys' difficulties in attempting to teach his unmusical wife to sing, at her decidedly negative ability, at Pepys' song-meanderings with his wife's maid, etc. Here are two of the many delightful quotations: "And after supper falling to singing with Mercer did however, sit up with her, she pleasing me with her singing of 'Helpe,

Which I acknowledge; but it is because the girl do take music mightily readily, and she do not, and musique is the thing of the world that I love most."

The Princeton University Press has recently published a fourth edition, revised, of "Hereditary and Environment in the Development of Men," by Edwin Grant Conklin, professor of biology in Princeton University. This is the eighth printing of this popular book, which made its appearance in 1915. The new edition, revised and rewritten, contains fresh material which adds to the scientific value and general interest of the work.

Dr. Augusto Cochrane de Alencar, the Ambassador from Brazil, has recently edited for immediate publication in English some of the novels of his father, the late Señor José de Alencar of Rio Janeiro. De Alencar was perhaps the best known of Brazilian writers. One of his novels is the basis for Gomes' libretto, "Il Guarani," whose marches and overtures are known everywhere.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Modern Italian Surgery.

It is almost impossible to write of "Modern Italian Surgery" without the preface that though the idea of Rome as the mother of most of the liberal arts—Greece is the father—is familiar enough, it yet comes with a shock of surprise to the average amount of ignorance that Italy has for centuries ranked pre-eminent among nations for her medical and surgical excellence. But such is the case. Dr. De Vecchi's book, which is an exposition of Italy's contemporary place in medical science joined to a history of the evolution of medicine and surgery in Italian universities, is literally a mine of information. Information, it would seem, for both layman and professional. It is not strange that the general public will find much that is new and even contrary to its preconceived notions; but it is remarkable that Italian surgery was only discovered by the war among the profession itself.

A résumé of the important steps of modern surgical development made by Italian scientists makes one wonder what other nations have contributed along these lines. According to our author, they had not even fully utilized Italian discoveries, which were rather discredited than otherwise, until the war made every experiment significant. Dr. George David Stewart, president of the New York Academy of Medicine, who has written the foreword to this volume, enumerates some of the particular strides made by modern Italian surgery. They are numerous, but the two most remarkable are Morelli's method of lung surgery and Vanghetti's kineplastic treatment for amputations.

The latter half of Dr. De Vecchi's book is devoted to a history of the universities of Italy, with special reference to the development of medical studies. Tradition attributes the foundation of the University of Bologna to Theodosius II in the fifth century, but the historical date of its foundation has been fixed at 1088. It is popularly believed among Italian intellectuals that Bologna is destined to be "a sort of post-graduate study and education for the world." Whatever her future, Italy has had a great medical past. From the tenth to the fifteenth centuries she was supremely the medical centre of the world. The achievements of the great men who graduated from and taught in the old Italian universities would require volumes to record. We can at least enumerate Constanzo Varolio, the world's greatest anatomist; Giulio Casserio, who first coordinated physiology and anatomy in reference to the vital functions of the body—a discovery which led to the further one of the circulation of the blood, described by William Harvey, who was one of Casserio's pupils at the University of Padua; Enrico Bottini, who initiated the use of carbolic acid solutions in operations long before Lister even mentioned it; Da Carpi, who published probably the first accurate anatomical work, and Fabricius ab Aquapendente, who has the merit of having established the character of a useful and accurate science.

One's enthusiasm in dealing with one in an effort to do justice to the great work of which Dr. De Vecchi's book is a monument, but a halt must be called somewhere.

In addition to its intrinsic merits, Dr. De Vecchi's book is locally interesting. The author is an eminent Italian who studied at the University of Turin, but who has spent his entire professional life in America. Dr. Paolo de Vecchi was a prominent surgeon in San Francisco for years before the great fire. He is at present a resident of New York City. His book is a tribute to his own great enthusiasms as well as to the surgical importance of his native land.

MODERN ITALIAN SURGERY, AND OLD UNIVERSITIES OF ITALY. By Paolo De Vecchi, M. D. New York: Paul B. Hoeber.

Saint Teresa.

An odd plot with an ordinary ending is how "Saint Teresa" may be characterized. We hoped against hope that it would not have the inevitable usual ending, that there need be no introduction of commonplace romance in a book sufficiently weighted with romance of another and a rarer sort. But in vain. The moving pictures are supposed to supply what the public wants, and judging from their prosperity, they do. And what movie director would waste time on a picture sans the conventional happy future-to-be? The novelists have merely watched the way the straws blew. No serious conscientious novelist, anxious to give courtesy and satisfaction, would dream of writing a novel whose theme rises above the mundane vulgarities of romance unless he capitulates toward the end of his performance with a wholly gratuitous drop into the bog of sentimentality. Presumably the public wades through anything from two to four hundred pages merely to be rewarded with a censored description of a love scene. Truly the strangest thing in nature is human lack of logic.

However, our complaint of "Saint Teresa" is confined to the last few pages. Otherwise, Mr. Harrison—and we give him the benefit of the doubt to assume that he doesn't like the ending any better than we do—has written an extremely readable, well-written book that has the ring—except for its unfortunate finish—of verisimilitude. Even the extraordinary figure of Teresa De Silver is not without its eccentric prototypes. And even they no doubt occasionally fall from the austere heights of supernormality. Mr. Harrison's and Saint Teresa's conclusion is not impossible. But it is too bad not to salvage one book from the deadly boredom of a love affair, tame or other. Well and good for the reader who leisurely peruses a novel a month and whose romantic vitality can assimilate a different affaire d'amour that frequently. But personally we have a grudge against Mr. Harrison for spoiling one day that might otherwise have been sans romance.

"Saint Teresa"—for the benefit of the many who like a happy finish whether or not—is the story of a struggle of principles, pacifism versus patriotism, idealism versus practicality in the early days of America's participation in the war. It is a vital theme and the interest is well sustained—till near the end.

SAINT TERESA. By Henry Sydney Harrison. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company; $2.

The Foreman and His Job.

During the past few years industrial managers throughout the country have come to realize the great importance of the foreman and his job. Foremen's conferences are a result of the new interest taken in this phase of industrialism—conferences in which foremen and minor executives are brought together under the direction of a "conference leader" for the discussion for the purpose of producing the best results under their own particular conditions of organization. The author of the present volume has played a prominent part in such conferences and has gathered contributions and suggestions from many foremen. He has compiled his material and arranged it so that it covers the entire field of operation. While the book deals more directly with the problems of a foreman in an industrial plant, the questions raised and the suggestions made apply almost as well to any one having supervisory responsibilities in plant, office, or commercial establishments.

THE FOREMAN AND HIS JOB. By Charles R. Allen. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company; $3.50.

An Anthology of Irish Verse.

Since the growth of the new school of Anglo-Irish literature and the accompanying renaissance of interest in Celtic literature there has been felt the want of an anthology of Irish poetry. Padraic Colum has supplied the long-felt need with his "Anthology of Irish Verse," which he says he would rather call an anthology of the poetry of Ireland, as his effort has been "to take the poetry of the people in the mass, and then to make a selection that would be representative of the people rather than of individual poets." Mr. Colum has followed his plan well. His theme is distinctly national and choice has been made of verse that reflects the national spirit rather than of the best work of Irish poets. Unlike the Oxford books of verse, the order followed is not chronological. Poems are grouped rather loosely under subject matter, as, for instance, "The Celtic World and the Land of Faery" and "Street Songs and Countryside Songs."

The only adverse criticism we make of this admirable collection is that the poems are undated. It may be that in the case of many anonymous and folk songs a date can not be determined, but in such cases it would be even interesting to know that the song's age is unknown.

Mr. Colum's compact introduction is an adequate guide to Irish poetic literature.

There has long been a legend among O. Henry's admirers connected with the publishing world that a packet of the great short-story-teller's letters, many of them charming expressions of his whimsical humor, has remained all these years locked up in a safety deposit vault, the key of which was held by the recipient of the letters. This was Miss Mabel Wagnalls, the daughter of the publisher, who, in 1910, after the death of her father, O. Henry, inherited the letters. She has now consented to their issue in a limited edition to be brought out in the spring by Doubleday, Page & Co. in their 377 series of de luxe, numbered editions. The title, "Letters to Lithopolis," refers to the quaint little Ohio village where Miss Wagnalls spent the summers. Lithopolis appealed to O. Henry's sense of humor and led him to make several whimsical sketches of the metropolis and its inhabitants.

"Pierre et Luce," Romain Rolland's new novel, is an exquisite idyll, the story of a boy and girl whose love is born "under the wing of death"—the war.

emotional or dramatic at the piano. He evidently loves Chopin, for he gave seven Chopin numbers. Of them all I thought he gave a most inspired interpretation of the Nocturne G major, the introspection of which evidently appeals to his special idiosyncrasy. It is like the musings of Hamlet set to music, and, as Godowsky rendered it, seemed like the two voices in a man's soul debating, discussing on life, death, or eternity. Marvelously beautiful was the eloquent tonal coloring in Godowsky's interpretation of this composition, in which he makes soul speak to soul.

In the final group we were offered compositions more various in style, the pianist having gratified the earnest seekers after technical excellence by beginning his programme with Schumann's "Twelve Symphonic Studies," in which was afforded a prolonged revelation of technical mastery practically absolute.

The Liadow Berceuse was not sufficiently tender and brooding, nor did the Rubinstein Serenade seem impassioned enough. Indeed, what Godowsky gave of his innermost was in the Chopin group. Liszt is too fiery and compelling a vehicle for Godowsky's calmer, more meditative genius, although in the Liszt "Tarantelle" he wove the most exquisite tonal embroideries, and led us dazzled to a place of beauty to exhibit to us in this realm of tone, chaplets of pearls and diamonds of incredible preciousness.

There are times in listening to this great artist that we merely wonder and admire. And then come passages in which we recognize that genius is there. For genius Godowsky has. I do not speak now of his supremacy in technique, but of that soul quality with which he at times lends a coloring of nobility to his tones. Sometimes he strikes chords almost as moving to the imagination as a great, calm sea. And again the poet in him lapses, and the listener is absorbed only in a profound appreciation of the technique of a master.

The Composer of "Funiculi-Funicula"

The death of Signor Denza recalls a mistake of Richard Strauss, who embodied "Funiculi-Funicula" in his orchestral fantasia, "Aus Italien," under the impression that it was an old folk-song. But Strauss was mistaken only in so far as the song is modern and most likely was written by Denza in London, where he lived for a number of years. "Funiculi-Funicula" is undoubtedly a genuine folk-song, and Denza is the only modern composer who has achieved as much, if there is anything in the saying, "I care not who makes the laws, let me write the songs."

Denza was a most remarkable man. Apart from this folk-song and a number of rather sentimental ballads, he did little of importance in real composition. He was, however, a great authority on singing, and the Royal Academy of Music loses in him one of the best exponents of the old Italian methods. He must have been one of the very few leading musicians who could claim to have sat on the seat of the great Mercadante, the heart and soul of the Neapolitan school and once a musician of world-wide reputation.

The Columbia Theatre.

The final presentation of "The Mikado," that delightful work by Gilbert and Sullivan, will be given this Saturday afternoon and night by the Dunbar Comic Opera Company at the Columbia Theatre. The splendidly-voiced organization has made a hit with music lovers, who anticipate a treat in the rendition of "The Bohemian Girl," announced for one week commencing with Sunday night. Always popular with theatre-goers, this Balfe opera in three acts will be staged in an elaborate fashion with a chorus of thirty and an orchestra under the baton of Hazelrigg. The title-role will be sung by Theo Pennington. Harry Pfeil will be seen and heard in the rôle of Thaddeus and Ed Andrews will be the Devilshoof of the cast. Paula Ayres, with her rich contralto voice, will essay the rôle of the Gipsy Queen, and Carl Bundschu that of Count Arnheim. George Olson, Ed Thomas, June Reed, Paula Rohrer, will all appear in the production of "The Bohemian Girl" with its many musical gems—"I Dreamt I Dwelt in Marble Halls," "Then You'll Remember Me," "Heart Bow'd Down," "Fair Land of Poland," etc. The third and final week of the comic opera engagement will be devoted to a big revival of Gilbert and Sullivan's "H. M. S. Pinafore."

The Orpheum Next Week.

"The Eighteenth Amendment" will receive dramatic exposition at the Orpheum next week, at the hands of James J. Corbett and Billy Van. Mr. Corbett may be remembered as the one-time champion heavyweight pugilist of the world; and what he does to the Eighteenth Amendment, with Mr. Van waving the towel in his corner between rounds, is said to be very funny.

Princess Jue Quon Tai is Chinese, and is referred to as the fairest flower of the old régime. She is certainly fair of face and figure and of charming manner, with just enough of that pleasing coquetry necessary to make the fair sex attractive and the ability to look well in either Chinese or American clothes. She has a good soprano voice, which she uses effectively in both Chinese and English.

Denis Chabot, the boy from Belgium, and Nonnette Tortini, the girl from France, offer an Americanized satire entitled, "When the Clock Rings." Mr. Chabot plays the violin and piano well, is a good comedian, and has the knack of putting songs over. His partner, Miss Tortini, is typically French, pert, attractive, vivacious, clever, and pretty to look upon, and wears clothes as one expects to find them worn on the boulevard.

There is always something new at the seashore. If there is any doubt of this fact Hugh McCormick and Grace Wallace will dispel it because their "At the Seashore" is something different. Mr. McCormick and Miss Wallace offer a ventriloquial comedy. The scene is a seashore hotel run by an old man who acts as life guard.

When Berk and Sawan are not actually dancing they are thinking up ideas for new dances, and the result is that they have an unusually large selection of dance steps. Among the best of these is a variety of Russian backsteps.

Adelaide and Hughes in their marvelous dance offering, Frank Van Hoven, "the Dippy Mad Magician," who has been throwing audiences into convulsions this week, and Artie Mehlinger and George Meyer, with a brand new collection of songs, will remain a second week.

"The Sorcerer"

The Players Club opens its spring season Friday evening with a brilliant revival of Gilbert and Sullivan's delightful opera, "The Sorcerer." One of the best singing casts the organization has ever brought together, with a singing chorus of forty, will be heard in this production.

Marguerite Fry Silvey sings the leading soprano rôle—that of Aline—and the tenor rôles are competently looked after by Nelson McGee, Easton Kent, and Joseph D. Hamilton. Baldwin McGaw and Trasford Charlton will be heard alternately in the part of the Sorcerer. Others in the cast of principals are S. Ralph Kellner, Sallie Benfield, Ruth Scott Laidlaw, Jane Parent, Atha A. Hillback, Floyd Lewis Giffen, and George H. Hooke. Austin Mosher is the musical director, and the general production is under the direction of Reginald Travers.

"The Sorcerer" was originally done in New York at the Old Casino, with Lillian Russell and Henry Dixey in the cast. It has not been heard in San Francisco since the old Tivoli days.

Kreisler Here But Once.

Fritz Kreisler, the great violinist, who has not been heard in San Francisco for five years, will give his only recital in Northern California at the Exposition Auditorium on Eastern Sunday afternoon, April 16th, under the local direction of Frank W. Healy.

At the request of many, Mr. Kreisler has included in his programme the Kreutzer Sonata of Beethoven. Carl Lamson will be at the piano.

Royal Gift for Rella.

Monsignor Rella, the conductor of the Sistine Chapel Choir, which Manager Frank W. Healy hopes to present in San Francisco some time next August, recently received from the Dowager Queen of Italy and Queen Elena a joint souvenir in appreciation of his direction in Rome of the two great concerts he gave for the restoration of a church in northern Italy, ruined during the great war. The gift took the form of a set of musical biographies bound in ivory and bearing the joint monograms of the royal donors. Monsignor Rella, who is a fluent composer, was at one time professor of music at the North American College at Rome, and no less a person than Toscanini has described him as the greatest choral conductor in the world.

The Telephone a French Invention?

There are now multitudes, who at a distance of thousands of kilometers, listen to concerts which, under the direction of Commandant Lorrain, the Eiffel Tower emits daily for four and a half to five hours.

This is the hour of tea. And music, which, it said, makes manners more gentle, also facilitates digestion.

While awaiting the time, when radio-telephony will be in general use, it is timely, says Le Petit Journal, to throw a retrospective look at the invention of the telephone.

It was sixty-eight years ago. A certain Charles Bourseul, a modest functionary employed in the Bourse, conceived an apparatus based on the principle of the transmission of the voice by an electrical conductor. He submitted his invention to several chiefs of his service. They advised him to do nothing with it.

Disappointed, rebuffed, but headstrong, Bourseul, nevertheless, in 1854, published in l'Illustration a strongly documented article on his discovery.

Twenty-eight years later, in 1882, Graham Bell and Edison, the reinventors of the telephone, frankly rendered homage to the French precursor.

Bourseul then lived on a small pension in a small market town, where he had gone to cultivate a garden. The French government, enlightened by the American revelation, discovered the unappreciated inventor and granted him, together with the red ribbon, a pension of 2000 francs.

Secretary of the Navy Denby has directed the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company to complete building the battleship West Virginia, it having been decided that that vessel, and not the Washington, should be finished under the terms of the naval limitation treaty.

Allenby of Megiddo.

General Allenby, when made a peer in recognition of his achievement as Deliverer of the Holy Land, took the title "Lord Allenby of Megiddo," or Armageddon, says the New York Times. He may come into another distinction as liberator of Egypt. He was recently pictured by the Times artist as if pondering over the riddle of Egypt, figured by the Sphinx in the background. It is characteristic of Allenby to take time to think his riddles through, and then to execute his decisions swiftly. In Palestine his plans for advance in the spring of 1918 were suddenly interrupted by the withdrawal of some of his troops to the western front. But he soon developed a new army with such thoroughness of discipline and strategy that when he suddenly did strike, as was said by the London Times after the battle of Armageddon (which made it impossible for the Turk to continue in the war), he achieved with artistic completeness a military conception unsurpassed in the brilliancy of its plan. So consummate was his success that it has been called a battle of dreams, because all that the soldier "dreamed" in his plans came true to the last detail.

It is too soon to say that Lord Allenby has guessed the riddle of Egypt. He has acted with such decision in treating self-seeking demagogues, with such consideration and sense of justice in meeting those who have the good of the Egyptian people really at heart, and with such straightforwardness and honor in everything, that it seems probable he has either divined out of his own experience or discovered in the Milner report the happy answer both for Egypt and for England. It is devoutly to be hoped that General Allenby will soon find himself released from his task in Egypt by the very completeness of his success in it, so that other nations in his debt may have an opportunity to welcome to their shores this greatest Crusader.

An international exhibition of stage-settings is being held in Amsterdam. English, American, Swiss, French, German, and Dutch artists are vying to show the best they can devise in scenery and costumes. The greatest interest is said to be shown in Shakespearean settings.

Among the natural phenomena of March was a flood in Venice.

VANITY FAIR.

The feminist rebellion, the woman's strike, long predicted, long expected, long curiously and apprehensively awaited, appears to have begun, and after the nature of "movements" in this age of strenuous propaganda and expert press agenting may be trusted, if it gets off to a good start, to spread like any other form of influenza. The endemic focus is still confined to Clinton County, Iowa, but the nature of the contagion, its acutely infectious character, and the country-wide continuity of the possible contacts, so to speak, may be trusted to bring about a rapid dissemination, unless nature has provided some powerful prophylaxis. With no government agency established to deal with the situation, although there appears these days to be a government bureau for dealing with every other known complaint and ailment of human kind, the encysting of the lesion will probably prove beyond the powers of the body politic. As we read the dispatches we fear the worst. It appears that in the town of Charlotte, Clinton County, Iowa, the great prairie state that has contributed so much to the development of the southern or movie end of California, Mrs. James McDermott is running for mayor, and Mrs. Nick Steiner and Mrs. Martin Neilson are candidates for the city council. They are being opposed by men candidates. Just who those daring, or hungry, men are the news does not relate, but one instinctively knows three men who they are not. Those three men are James McDermott, Nick Steiner, and Martin Neilson. As far as the dispatches from the theatre of war are concerned, those gentlemen dwell in obscurity, perhaps in security. The trouble does not appear to be domestic, and if it were we should be little agitated about it. What makes it of public moment is that it has taken on a public aspect that may well excite alarm. For it is said that more than a score of the town's fairest daughters have served notice on the town's eligible and ineligible bachelors that unless the feminine candidates are elected the aforesaid bachelors, eligible or ineligible, need not call around. It is not a question of individual merit. It matters not how strenuously any given bachelor may have labored to elect some other man's wife to council or mayoralty. The condition in the ukase is clear and unmistakable. Those ladies must be elected, or the unmarried men of Charlotte will have to pass their evenings henceforth in the movie theatre, the lecture room, or the dry pool hall.

Needless to point out again, the ultimatum is not merely of local concern. It may not be so very important whether these ladies are elected to these particular offices or not. If they are not, we may suppose that politics in Charlotte will continue to be conducted in the good old way, some of the victors enjoying all the spoils that will go around, after the internecine strife in the victorious party over the division of those spoils has subsided with the usual manifestations of bolting, treason, recrimination, and general soreheadedness, gradually healing with the slow approach of renewed hope and the next election. And private life in Charlotte may be expected to heal itself in time, so that the tinkle of mandolins will again be heard on Wednesday nights from the dim piazzas under the elms, although in many cases it will not be the same mandolin tinkling to the same girl. And if the feminine candidates are elected, we may expect politics to be conducted just about in the same way, with the possible addition of some great constructive achievement, such as the establishment of a municipal pussy-willow farm so that the "feminist movement" may be carried a step farther. No. It is not the fate of Charlotte that alarms, for if things are improperly conducted there, after the ladies take over the town government, the rest of the population can move and the bondholders look elsewhere for their remedy. What we are concerned about is how far the new coercive method is applicable in national politics, and whether or not any way can be discovered to stop this threatened wholesale corruption of the suffrage. For the business looks bad. The example is easy to imitate. And if the women of the nation once woke up to the fact that they might acquire an unlimited provision of pussy-willows merely by refusing men callers before every city, state, or national election, it might seem to them better than the present method of supply, and then no one could tell what would happen either to our town housekeeping or our foreign relations.

Fortunately there is one little rift of light in the darkness, one gleam of hope through the clouds that lower. It is related by the veracious correspondent of the Associated Press that the ultimatum was conceived and first proclaimed by the mothers of Charlotte, and that the daughters of Charlotte merely approved the mandate. If those daughters still retain any respect for maternal authority, and we admit that such a thing is extremely unlikely in this day and age—but if they do retain any respect for such authority, the whole trouble may in the nick of time be averted through the intelligently excited operation of natural law. For there is probably no force in organized opinion, no power in any public movement whatsoever, comparable to the ceaseless, endless energy of maternal competition for eligible bachelors. Let the bachelors of Charlotte take the bull by the horns. It is their duty, it is their high and holy privilege, to maintain the purity of our elections and the unsullied character of our politics. Let them provide themselves with banners bearing the stirring legend, "Votes for Men, Not Mannikins," and picket the residences of their home town. Let them shift about, no one picketing the residence where once he was wont to tease the mandolin or pluck the catgut of the light guitar, but each pacing the sidewalk before the home of what used to be some other fellow's girl. They can confidently expect general consternation in maternal breasts, followed by delicately-worded invitations to call once more but be sure and say nothing about it. They may even expect cake. But cake or popcorn, they will achieve their independence. And having achieved theirs, they will have done much for their country, and for every married Mr. Jiggs in it.

From the current Bookman we cull this concatenation of words, phrases, dashes, and interjection marks. It is by Carl Sandburg:

This is a good book? Yes?
Throw it at the moon.
Stand on the ball of your right foot
And come to the lunge of a centre fielder
Straddling in a throw for the home plate.
Let her go—span—this book for the moon—yes?
And then—other books, good books, even the best books—shoot 'em with a long twist at the moon—yes?

It was designated poetry. Poor Keats, and poor Kipling! If that is poetry they were sadly mistaken in what they undertook and in what they did. If that is poetry there is no sense in keeping unfortunate persons in mad-houses any longer. Our hospitals for the insane must be full of poets. If that is poetry the gentleman that went to Africa to learn to talk to the baboons and chimpanzees would better have remained at home. He could have had a poet brought to him every morning from the nearest psychopathic ward, and derived from him as much of force, beauty, wit, and philosophy as he could have learned from any monkey of the lot. If that is poetry, any person henceforth finding himself in the company of a poet is entitled to adopt extreme measures for his own security.

More and more clearly the experience of the world seems to confirm the wisdom in that cryptic warning Pythagoras gave his disciples, "abstain from beans." If Claude A. Barnes of Marysville had heeded the Pythagorean admonition he would now be at large. Unfortunately, business brought him into too close association with the leguminous food product, which he saw daily spread before him in such redundant volume that it seemed as though the supply were sufficient for all the needs of man and a little over. He worked in a bean warehouse; and some of those beans that were his employers' he used to ship to Sacramento, and then go there and collect for the shipments, applying the moneys so gathered to his own uses—touring car, gasoline, tires, fine furniture in his house, jewelry, and the like. His employers did not seem sensible of their losses, any more than they would have missed a few barrels of water out of the Yuba. The possibilities of beans, used in this way, were astonishing.

But the ways of Providence are more so. It may be recalled that Peer Gynt once had occasion to remark: "God is good. But economical, that He is not." In order to recall Mr. Barnes of Marysville to a due and proper sense of his ethical lapse, and of his temporarily forgotten obligations toward the beans in his custody, Providence derailed a train on the Sacramento Northern, upon which train Mr. Barnes was transporting for his own financial advancement beans belonging to another. We can not presume to say that Providence spilled the beans; rather that Mr. Barnes did. It was an expensive method of dealing with the matter, but effective, for the railway company notified the owners of the beans, who thus learned for the first time of the shipment, and of Mr. Barnes' peculiar business genius. That promoted complications. The grand jury took a hand in the bean business of Mr. Barnes, and another agency of Providence known as a court of law recalled him to an understanding of his duty by means of an indeterminate sentence for grand larceny. And the moral of that is, that if you must deal unlawfully with other people's beans, transport them on a railway that Providence can not wreck.

If the movies are not trying to attain prudery they are at least striving for prudence, which is sometimes just as good. Managers and "producers" are viewing with alarm the recent public demand for moral pictures, and are cudgeling tired brains for ways and means whereby films may be turned out in volume, which shall be at once pure and profitable. It is a distressing situation, for they know that the aforesaid public demand is largely public humbug, and that if you try to conform to humbug you are quite likely to find yourself with quantities of unsaleable goods on hand. We should like to assist these hard-worked men, and hence refer them for a model of chemical purity and of free and lightsome humor to a play just produced at the University of California under the title "Wild Birds," which is as good a movie title as you will find on any billboard. Its purity shines with the effulgence of all the pearls that ever "lay under Oman's green water," which is sufficiently indicated by this passage from a competent reviewer: "When the farmer learns that the love of the boy and girl has brought consequences and that she is to become a mother, he beats the boy to death and the girl jumps down the well." We should think the movie people could "do with that," and it is right from the university campus.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Junior was in the habit of coming to the table with a dirty face and, of course, had to be sent away. One time his mother, nearly losing patience, said: "Junior, why do you persist in coming to the table without washing? You know I always send you away." "Well," said Junior meekly, "once you forgot."

A cowman from Medicine Bow stepped into a cigar store in Chicago and asked for a match. "Matches," replied the clerk, "are for sale, not to give away." "How much are they?" "One cent a box." The cowman bought a box, and handed it back after taking out a match. "Here," he said, "put that back on your shelf, and when a gentleman asks you for a light give him one."

A vicar of a scattered rural parish had a remarkable knowledge of the fungi. So keen was he on his hobby, that he sometimes neglected his pastoral work to search for specimens. One day he stopped to see a bed-ridden old lady, who immediately reminded him how long it was since he had made his last call. "If I had been a toadstool," she declared, "you'd have been to see me long ago."

Simpson had been invited to the wedding of his friend, Tom. Arriving at the home, Simpson was formally introduced to the bride—whom he had never met. After the ceremony, Simpson drew his friend aside. "Tom," he whispered, "what in the world is the matter with you? Why, that woman is twice as old as you! Her hair and her teeth are false, and she's as ugly as a toad." "You needn't whisper, Simpson; she's also deaf."

Donald MacTavish lay a-dying. He had been all day about it, and his wife, who had watched with patient expectancy since early morn, began to feel the call of her neglected household duties. "Awel, Don," she said, as she moved the light to the table by his bed, "I mus' gang along to the kitchen the noo. Ye'll no be takin' yer departure afore I come back. But if ye should, ye'll not forget to blow out the candle afore ye dee, wiil ye?"

The fact that his supposedly adored big brother was returning home from college that day had been carefully concealed from ten-year-old Tommy until he came back from school. "Tommy," said his mother, after her younger son had gone upstairs to wash his face, and the elder had been concealed in the pantry, "I have a big surprise for you." "I know what it is," replied Tommy unconcernedly. "Brother's back." "Why, how did you guess that?" "Because my bank won't rattle any more."

Frederick Niven's "A Tale That Is Told" has a note for library ladies who want "the very latest." Two in Glasgow asked in turn and in duet for half a dozen novels, all of which were announced unprocurable with the stereotyped, "I'm sorry, there is not a copy in at present." At last the youth who attended to them came triumphantly back with a volume they had asked for. "Oh," said one. "We won't have it, since it is in. It can't be any good. We want books that every one is reading." The other agreed: "If it's in, we don't want it."

"Well," cried Mrs. Henpeck, "our son is engaged to be married. We will write to the dear lad and congratulate him." Mr. H. agreed; he dared not do otherwise. "My darling boy," read the son the next day, "what glorious news! Your father and I rejoice in your happiness. It has long been our greatest wish that you should marry. A good woman is heaven's precious gift to man. She brings out all the best in him, and helps him to suppress all that is evil." Then there was a postscript in a different handwriting: "Your mother has gone for a stamp. Keep single, you young noodle."

Abraham Lincoln Jones, colored, was in indignant controversy with Washington Scott, also colored. The dice had been turning up in favor of the chocolate-tinged Washington, and a faint suspicion of fraud began to dawn upon Jones. "Look heah, you niggah," he blurted out, "dem things got to tuhn diff'nt or day's goin' be a big fuss roun' heah!" "Fuss? Man, fuss? W'at kine of fuss yo' kallilate stahtin'?" Know who I am? Down in Looville dey call me Wood Alcohol, I'se so tough." "Wood Alcohol! Dat aint no name fo' yo'," rejoined Abraham. "Why, down Nashville, whah I come from, dey'd call yo' Sweet Cidah."

The ceremony was over, both had "I willed" and the happy couple were receiving the clergyman's blessing. First he said a few cheering words to the bride, then he turned to the bridegroom to give him a few words of advice. "Now, my son," he said, "you have come to the end of all your troubles." A few months passed and the man met the clergyman again. Overcoming his feelings, the man managed to gulp out: "I thought you told me at my wedding I had come to the end of all my troubles?" The clergyman smiled. "My friend," he beamed, "I did not tell you which end."

A young but exceptionally brilliant professor in a Western college was dismissed from the faculty because of his inordinate betting. The president, interested in his career, secured him a position in an Eastern college. To the president there he wrote: "The young man has a promising future, and anything you can do to cure him of betting will be of benefit to society." The professor went East, and was cordially received. Conversation had proceeded but a few moments when he said to the president, "I'll bet you seventy-five dollars you have a wart between your shoulder blades." The president hesitated. "Young man," he said, "I never bet; but just to teach you a lesson I will take you up." He thereupon proved to the young man's satisfaction that he was in error, and the professor paid the seventy-five. The president wrote West relating the incident, concluding—"I hope that I have cured him." The other wrote back: "I fear the case is hopeless. The very day he left here he bet me one hundred dollars that he could make you take off your shirt."

Old Mrs. Practical—My dear, it's about time for you to choose a mate. Young Miss Nautical—Mate nothing! I have my eye on a captain.—Judge.

THE MERRY MUSE.

"All Put."

("Bring something for supper" is a request often found penciled, according to the Daily Chronicle, after a formally printed invitation to a dance.)

To Lady Clara Vere de Vere,
The bard presents his deep respects;
He will, he begs to say, appear
On Wednesday week, as she directs;
And with him he will also take
(As all her cards expressly ask)
A lump of pie, a slice of cake,
Likewise a well-appointed flask.

Of course, he'll bring as hitherto
His own tame partner for the ball,
Aware that if he doesn't do
There won't be one for him at all;
He notes (with some relief once more)
That, after all, as matters stand,
He's not supposed to lay the floor
Or hire and bring along the band.

However, that will doubtless come;
But, meanwhile, we would fain inquire,
Does no one, giving rout or drum,
Arrange to give the thing entire?
As fashion fixes such affairs,
Does no one ever send around
An invitation-card that bears
The reassuring note "All Found"?
—Lucio in the Manchester Guardian.

Inconstant Nature.

At Pebble Beach the Del Monte Properties Company is planting some deciduous trees, thereby inviting the criticism of sundry persons who regard such a departure as artificial and hence objectionable. To such critics, Mark Daniels, the landscape artist, has this to say, in the Del Monte Chukkur:

"It is doubtful whether that group of people who are always crying, 'Oh, let's keep our planting natural,' say what they mean or know what they are saying. In all probability they mean that nothing should be planted except those species that are growing in the immediate vicinity. But this is not natural in the slightest degree.

"Nature, particularly in the case of her flora and silva, is continually changing. Our geologists give an accurate record of the constant changes in the character of our land vegetation that has been going on since the early periods of the world's history. The Cycads, Auricarias, Ginkos, Yews, and Cedars are gradually being crowded off the earth by later varieties of broadleaf and coniferous trees. Birds and breezes scatter seeds over the world and new varieties spring up in old places. Climatic conditions change, cypress gives way to pine, and later the pine yields to casacara. The sycamore drives the older inhabitants from the valley and buckeyes take possession of the sloping ravines. You can see the process going on at present at Pebble Beach. At the mouth of Wildcat Cañon the willows are driving back into the hills. Evidently the 'Keep it natural' group do not mean exactly what they say. Nature means constant change, and the judicious introduction of varieties of flora and silva is no contravention of its habits."

According to Dr. C. E. Moldeuke, the Egyptologist, the alphabet was not invented by the Phœnicians, who merely "lifted" twenty-two letters from the Egyptians and then spread them as their own through Greece and Italy.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

William Webster Ellsworth, a well-known American publisher, recently retiring as the president of the Century Company, will speak in the Paul Elder Gallery, Wednesday afternoon, April 5th, at 2:30 o'clock, on "Forty Years a Publisher," a lecture of literary reminiscences. Ellsworth will tell anecdotes of Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Jack London, Theodore Roosevelt, Henry James, Joseph Jefferson, John Burroughs, and many others. He will tell of the celebrated suppressed interview with the German emperor in 1908. His San Francisco engagement is under the direction of Paul Elder.

"The Flaming Arrow."

A presentation of Mary Carr Moore's opera, "The Flaming Arrow," followed the annual breakfast of the Philomath Club on last Monday afternoon at the Century Club. To hear a rendition of this musical gem, which was directed by the composer, is forever to refute the theory that woman possesses no creative genius. Mary Carr Moore (Mrs. Arthur Duclos) is one of the really talented women of the West. Her rank as a composer was established several years ago upon the first rendition, in Seattle, of her opera, "Narcissa."

Whitcomb Bridge Luncheon.

CURRENT VERSE.

The Montessori Child.

I know some little girls and boys
Who play with blocks and other toys;
But no one offers toys to me
Except to use as "stimuli."

I look at children romp and shriek;
They play a game called hide-and-seek;
They run and hide, and shout and run,
And have the greatest lot of fun.

But where I go they only play
To gather knowledge day by day,
And so absorb an education
Through "muscular coordination."

They gum rough letters on a board,
I learn them of my own accord;
I play at hide-and-seek with these,
And thus I get my A, B, C's.

Some children have a game called war,
They march lead soldiers on the floor;
But where I go it is enough
To know that things are smooth or rough.

While other children call it "fun"
To hop and skip and jump and run
I do these things unconsciously
To set my little spirit free.

While other children merely play,
I garner wisdom every day.
I'm never up to childish tricks.
Yes, aint I cute? I'm only six!

—Bert Leston Taylor.

Grand Op.

If opera "flats" were done by Tintoretto,
Instead of being painted by machine,
I'd lend no ear to music or libretto,
But spend the evening gazing at the scene.

If opera "books" were written by a poet
And not the work of literary "shines,"
The band might play and I should never know it;
I'd sit content to listen to the lines.

If opera scores were more than ornamental,
Were music pure and simple, nobly planned—
Instead of being merely incidental—
I'd close my eyes and listen to the band.

But op. at best is but a combination,
It isn't this or that thing or the next;
The song but serves the scene as decoration,
The scene but serves to decorate the text.

So when to op. in raiment glad I amble,
'Tis not as music worshipper I go.
The thing that draws me is the toot ensamble—
The purple pageant of the Passing Show.

—Bert Leston Taylor.

Words to an Irish Air,

If I had a lover, now, who would he be?
Yourself with your laughter, your gay gallantry?
Yet I'd know when you kissed me your heart was not mine,

But kneeling in tears at a lost lady's shrine.
Or if I should seek him who loves me too well,
Do you think with my head on his breast he could tell?

Would he know that however I strove to be true
My vagabond heart was still following you?
This dicing of hearts is a perilous game;
Be it one or another the end is the same,

There is sure to be sorrow however they fall,
So I think I shall not have a lover at all.
—From "Vigils," by Aline Kilmer.

Little Things.

There's nothing very beautiful and nothing very gay

About the rush of faces in the town by day,
But a light tan cow in a pale green mead,
That is very beautiful, beautiful indeed. . . .

And the soft March wind, and the low March mist
Are better than kisses in the dark street kissed. . . .
The fragrance of the forest when it wakes at dawn,

The fragrance of a trim green village lawn,
The hearing of the murmur of the rain at play—
These things are beautiful, beautiful as day!
And I shan't stand waiting for love or scorn
When the feast is laid for a day new-born. . . .

Oh, better let the little things I loved when little Return when the heart finds the great things brittle;

And better is a temple made of bark and thong
Than a tall stone temple that may stand too long.

—Orrick Johns.

On clear autumnal evenings I have stood
Upon the bridge of jewelers and seen
The twilight fall on Florence, Arno's queen;
And every gliding form in cloak and hood
Was you, and every maid with gilded snood
On flaxen hair was Beatrice, sweet, serene,
High above passion, touching life with clean
Virginal hands, that beckoned to elude!

And always in my mind the wonder grows,
With Beatrice your wife would you have sung
Those deathless songs whose beauty swells and flows

Down centuries of time? Could you have wrung
Such music from love-gratified repose,
Gained inspiration from soft hands that clung?
—Virginia Taylor McCormick in "Voices."

"We'll have to stop work on 'The Gladiator's

Junior Golf.

The California Golf Association has announced the dates of July 13th to 16th for the holding of the fourth annual State Junior Championship at Del Monte. A number of boys will participate in this event, as it comes during school vacation, when their parents will be down for a visit. The Annual Golf Celebration, which will settle the championship for men and women, will come on September 2d to 10th, taking in the Labor Day and Admission Day holidays.

Training for Husbands.

One evening, according to the Spanish newspapers, a young Spanish nobleman, the possessor of a vast estate and a magnificent chateau in the neighborhood of Cordova, visited a traveling menagerie.

There he was dazzled by the sight of a young and beautiful woman who made a dozen ferocious jaguars perform various tricks. To see her was, to him, to fall passionately in love with her. He ascertained that she belonged to a good family of Madrid, which had vainly tried to prevent her from following her vocation as animal tamer, and was of irreproachable morals.

The nobleman offered his title, his estate, his hand. She accepted. But eight days after the wedding the young woman refused to receive all friends and acquaintances and remained alone in the chateau with her husband, who also became invisible.

This lasted four months, at the end of which the husband escaped and hastened to complain to the authorities. His bride, incapable of surrendering her profession, had promoted him to the rank of a jaguar and spent most of her time with a horsewhip making him perform the tricks of her former pets at the menagerie.

This "jaguar in spite of himself" preferred saving himself by fleeing like a hare, and now he asks the courts to separate him from his trainer-wife.

A resident of Konigsburg, Germany, recently papered the walls of his room with Austrian and Polish banknotes. Thousand-crown notes were used as a border and 100-pound notes formed the remainder of the "wallpaper."

The Passion Play at Oberammergau owes its inception to the gratitude of the peasants for the cessation of the plague in 1633.

"I can't play 'Macbeth' before twenty people," said the famished tragedian. "Think about your art," said his manager, soothingly. "I can not even do that," replied the star, with a tragic gesture. "A stage hand is eating a 'hot dog' in the wings."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Sportsman—How's that boy I sent you shaping for a hunt servant? Huntsman—Not must use, I'm afraid. You remember the other day, when we had that good fifty minutes spoiled by runnin' to ground in the dark? Well, only next morning I heard that boy whistling as if nothing had happened.—Punch.

"Your honor, I was not intoxicated." "But this officer says you were trying to climb a lamp post." "I was, your honor. A couple of cerise crocodiles had been following me around all day, and I don't mind telling you that they were getting on my nerves."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

"Who is the wisest man mentioned in the Scriptures?" asked a teacher of one of her Sunday-school class. "Paul," exclaimed the little fellow, confidently. "Oh, no, Johnnie; Paul was a very good man, but Solomon is mentioned as the wisest man." "Well, my father says Paul was the wisest man, because he never married, and I think my father ought to know," replied the boy emphatically.—Los Angeles Times.

A FRENCH VIEW.

Those Americans who love to sneer at "the failure of prohibition" will be distressed by the opinion of a disinterested French observer, who is of course a moderate drinker and would be glad to see French wines and liquors admitted into the United States (says the New York Times). M. Joseph Galtier sends to the Paris Temps his impressions of the dryness of America. "Over the whole surface of the United States," he writes mournfully, "only a few rare privileged persons are able to scorn the prohibition law. The mass is condemned to a dull hydrophily." The privilege of extraterritoriality gave the delegates to the Conference exemption from the prevailing siccity. They were free to drink what they liked, but the members of the American government set a good example. "I lunched two or three times with Mr. Hughes," says M. Galtier, "at banquets where he was the guest of honor, and also with a small party at one of the Washington clubs. Water and pieces of ice flowed continuously. That was the official drink, the state drink. Besides that nothing was tolerated but a sort of fruit juice, a water 'cup' with such a strong concentrated aroma that you thought you were drinking an elixir and strong essences, all the perfumes of Araby. Surely, special palates and gullets are needed to endure these learned mixtures." At the White House, at a "five o'clock," nothing but chocolate and tea. "President Harding is a convinced prohibitionist."

Wine, alcoholic liquors of any sort, are "apples of the Garden of the Hesperides, Rheingold." It is a game with no fixed rules to prize them. Extraterritoriality couldn't protect the treasure of the French delegates. On the way from the station to their hotel in Washington a case of Italian vermouth, "destined to fabricate cocktails," was stolen from the truck. This was only the beginning of a series of mysterious disappearances. One Frenchman had carefully carried from New York a bottle of real Pernod absinthe. He cherished it as the apple of his eye. He took infinite precautions to hide it. It fled on mysterious wings the very day of his arrival. A still cleverer instance of the strong desire to rob the delegates of the means of sin was the evanishment of a case of champagne. From its hiding place in the seventh story this faded away invisibly. Somebody weary of "dull hydrophily" sought the bubble champagne even at that dizzy height.

In New York there is a certain alleviation of the rigors of prohibition, but prices are prohibitive. Twenty-five dollars for a quart of champagne! Think of that, and say if even wettest New York is not arid save for a few Fortunati! Dinners and suppers are rather dreary on account of the lack of wine. A fashionable cabaret is a cold affair in the absence of the "great animator." It is the fashion for gentlemen to carry in their "revolver pocket" a silver flask of whisky, a "flasket." But, whatever the practices of the few and the portage and colportage of clandestine whisky in New York, "prohibition really exists." Diplomats and foreigners mingling in their society or in fashionable society may be skeptical about the sway of the dry régime. M. Galtier hears ever the rattling of the pieces of ice in the universal great American beverage. "Never go on board without biscuit" is a maxim of sailors. If you are going to the United States, don't forget your store of wines and liquors, our French friend warns his countrymen. He doesn't say how those forbidden guests are to be retained at the dock by tourists who have no right to utter the open sesame of extraterritoriality.

Fasting for Health.

A secret for the preservation of good health is claimed to have been discovered by the English physician, Dr. Leonard Williams, who writes about it in the Lancet. He has observed in the case of himself and numerous patients that a fast of a few days strengthened the body against all kinds of diseases and kept all of them youthful, fresh, and elastic. Dr. Williams prescribes a three-day fast with no food of any kind and only water to drink. Those who submit to this treatment feel on the first day, craving; the second, resignation; the third, rejoicing and rejuvenation.

The rationale of its beneficence, according to Dr. Williams, is probably as follows: In the ordinary routine of town life we do not completely oxidize all that is taken into the body. There remains a residue, which is only partly oxidized. These "sub-oxidizes," as he calls them, are mildly but cumulatively toxic and give rise to many of the minor maladies and discomforts of everyday life.

All insignia of monarchical Germany must be removed from the public buildings, Minister of the Interior Adolf Koester recently told the Reichstag. He added that the government had decided to fix a definite period within which this decision would be carried out. Exceptions will be made, he said, only where these emblems have been structurally incorporated in buildings where their removal would destroy the architectural value and effect. All paintings, busts, and statues in government offices must also be removed if their retention is incompatible with the republican régime.

The Symphony Orchestra.

However it may be regretted, the fact none the less remains that for several years past there has been a rift in the lute of San Francisco's musical community. Maintenance of the Symphony Orchestra has been made difficult and its worth as a community interest measurably diminished because a very considerable number of persons normally able and normally willing to contribute to its support have been out of sympathy with its administration. Many things have contributed to this condition, most seriously personal and national sentiments associated with the war. Leadership of the orchestra has been a bone of contention—a contention so serious as seriously to affect the fortunes of the Musical Association. The short of it is that there is a Hertz faction and an anti-Hertz faction; and this being so, Mr. Hertz, whose abilities as a leader are unquestioned, has become an obstacle to the maintenance and development of the orchestra. The feeling has existed too long and runs too deep for friendly adjustment. So long as Mr. Hertz remains the musical community will be broken into factions and the orchestra will lack the backing that it should and would have from a united community. Under these circumstances Mr. Hertz ought to retire. Not because he has failed artistically, but because continuance of his leadership means continuance of animosities and contentions and therefore a hindrance to the musical interests of San Francisco. Even if Mr. Hertz' partisans should be willing to supply financial support for continuance of the Hertz régime it would be a mistake to go on with it, since both in its musical and social effects it has become a source of division and ill-will.

At best, with all elements of the musical community pulling together, maintenance of a highly efficient symphony orchestra in San Francisco is something of a problem; and this problem ought not to be made more serious by stubborn insistence upon uncompromisable conditions. Sound policy calls for reorganization of the orchestra. All of which is said without reflection upon the artistic or the personal merits of that very capable organizer and leader, Mr. Alfred Hertz.

Political Meddling.

Those who heard the gentleman from Czecho-Slovakia at the Commonwealth Club luncheon the other day did not learn a great deal about the concrete causes of suffering in Central Europe, because the lecturer felt the grievances of classes and failed to define the common troubles in terms of work and economics. But those who heard the editor of the Nation's Business at the Oakland Chamber of Commerce luncheon the following Monday did hear something we should all do well to heed, for it was definite and it presented an evil which, through imitation and repetition, has grown typical of our country, and which if that country were not so strong and wealthy would bring upon us burdens almost as heavy as those the states of Central Europe now have to bear. If we have made an odious comparison between the two speakers it is merely to point a moral through contrast of method. One was a witty Bohemian savant, dealing in generalities, whose sallies at the present industrial constitution of society amused, but did not convince. The other was a plain-spoken American who knows business troubles when he sees them, and understands that they are the burden of all classes alike.

In both regions, Central Europe and the United States, it is a plain case of too much government. We are not cursed here as they are in Europe with a multiplication of boundaries to retard the flow of merchandise and reduce production and distribution to an almost fatal minimum. But we are cursed with a lot of doctrinaires and theorists who know nothing about the requirements of production and distribution, and who induce legislators who know less to pass paternalistic and meddlesome laws which interfere at critical points with that general striving for individual betterment which is the greatest material force in human affairs, and which alone has ever been found competent to feed, clothe, shelter, and advance the civilization of any considerable number of people whose culture was a single degree beyond the merest primitive. Security for property, that men may be induced and enabled to accumulate capital; freedom of bargain and sale, whether of commodities or services; the enforcement of contracts freely entered into; and the enforcement of criminal justice against any sort of criminal, no matter what social excuse he may plead for his crime—such things are indispensable to any measure of prosperity. On such policies has been based the present industrial order, which, in spite of all its defects, has produced every worth-while material element of our civilization. "Business," word hated by the long-hairs and damned by the mentally diseased, has brought within the general reach almost every method, appliance, and commodity which now contributes to a life of reasonable comfort and safety and health, as well as of pleasure or of intellectual progress. For even those great altruists who have brought forth political systems and scientific discoveries for the benefit of man have had to be supported, while they labored, by the fruits of the individualistic industrial system. Every article of trade we see advertised in a street-car, a magazine, or a newspaper has come into existence because some individual hoped to profit by its production and sale. No government has ever been established that could do this work so effectively, nor on so grand a scale, as the automatically coördinated efforts of all the individuals of the nation, trying to serve the public because they had to in order to serve their own greed. At times, as the Argonaut has indicated elsewhere, the meaner-minded business man has a tendency to grow intolerably tyrannous. The selfish motive is not beautiful nor poetic. The system is not ideal. But it works and sweats and plans and worries for us all, day and night, in farm and mine and factory and counting-house. It has been working that way since the days of Tyre and Carthage, and there is no reason in the nature of man to believe that anything much better will be developed for a long time to come.

Yet we have incessant interferences by statute with these great spontaneous forces that are trying to do the work of the world. We have had political pests in our legislatures who have introduced bills to regulate the size of bird cages, and of blankets, and the length of the turn-over of hotel sheets, no matter whether you wanted a hotel sheet that would choke you in your sleep or not. In California we have been cursed with a lot of regulatory commissions, whose plain purpose was to reverse all political evolution and step backwards from a hard-won reign of law to a reign of men, or little pesky kings. They have interfered with fundamentals and have added heavy handicaps to industry, while drawing their salaries out of a continually growing taxation. We are not yet ruined by it, but the tendency toward paternalism, or political meddling, is growing stronger every day, and it is wholly evil.

The editor of the Nation's Business, Mr. Thorpe, told his audience in Oakland that in a three-months survey of the country Senator Borah had discovered 1000 legislative bills providing that government should interfere with business in some way or another. Now, if government were omniscient, its interference would not be a good thing, because it is much better that men work out their own salvation. They can never be more than children if somebody else does it for them. But government is not omniscient, and if there ever was a time in history when that fact stuck out like the sore thumb of the world it is now. Government is nothing but a lot of men, and they are not all the most able and effective men in the community, either. Many of the members of our state legislatures could not make a success of keeping a coffee-and-doughnut restaurant. Yet they have the power to establish new, tax-supported commissions to regulate everything under the sun, from the height of stools in department stores to telling a farmer whether he can or can not bore for water on his own land.

Perhaps it is too much to hope there will be an end of it. But a strong man who would threaten all further legislation of that variety with a veto, and promise to abolish a few regulating commissions if he could, would make a mighty good candidate for governor of this state, or any other.

A Statesman Who Doesn't Cringe.

Mr. Lloyd George never leaves anybody in doubt as to his projects. If he wants something he goes straight to it. Determination, candor, with indifference, real or apparent, to his own political fortunes, make a combination that lifts him as a practical statesman immeasurably above his contemporaries.

The latest project of Mr. Lloyd George is the establishment of working relations with Russia. He proposes a limited recognition of the existing Russian régime subject to (1) recognition of Russian debts contracted under the Czarist régime; (2) reduction of the Red army; (3) pledge on the part of the existing to hold to present geographic limits; (4) opening of Russian ports; (5) maintenance in Russia of agencies for the protection of trade. Nothing remotely suggestive of sympathy with the Soviet régime is proposed. Recognition in the form Mr. George advises does not imply a moral whitewash. It is simply an economic arrangement.

In the opinion of Mr. Lloyd George the economic disease from which Europe is suffering may not be cured while Russia stands isolate and apart. The supplies which Russia only can yield are needed; the market for finished products which Russia affords is essential. It is with reference to these considerations that the proposed policy has been formulated. That what he wants today runs counter to fixed British sentiment and that it involves a radical change in policy is perfectly well known to Mr. Lloyd George. None the less he seeks to pursue a course essential in his judgment to the welfare of England; and he put the matter up to Parliament on Monday of this week. He demanded a vote of confidence with the clear intimation that failure to receive it would mark the end of his career in the premiership. He faced many elements of hostility—a fixed opposing national sentiment, an organized group of laborites, a mass of opposing jealousy and general unfriendliness. The vote tells the story. A resolution of confidence carried by the overwhelming vote of 372 to 94. Now Mr. Lloyd George will go to the Genoa conference strong, not only in definite purposes, but strong in the declared support of fundamental authority in the British government.

The world looks with admiration upon a man who combines with the powers of a great position the ability to sustain himself under criticism, plus indifference to his immediate personal fortunes. Right or wrong in his judgments, such a man is a truly dignified figure. He presents a splendid contrast to the cringing politician—whose name is legion here and elsewhere—so fearful of his tenure as to sacrifice all that is worth while in individual character to preservation of his job.

Status of the Bonus Raid.

The bonus bill is now comfortably asleep in the files of the Senate Finance Committee. When it went over from the House last week its friends wished to have it referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Objection was made by Senator Wadsworth, who from the first has stood against the raid, and after some discussion his suggestion that the bill go to the Finance Committee prevailed. That it will come again before the Senate soon or in anything like the form it passed the House is not expected. The Finance Committee is notoriously never in a hurry. Furthermore, it has in hand a tariff bill and several other still undigested proposals, and these will have to be gotten out of the way before the bonus bill may be considered. Two members of the committee, Chairman McCumber and Mr. La Follette, both hot advocates of the bonus, would like to accord it preferential treatment, putting it on the schedules ahead of its regular order, but a large majority of the committee is reported to be against peremptory or hurried procedure.

While opponents of the bill have thus succeeded in thrusting it to one side, its promoters are not idle. Commander MacNider of the American Legion and Edward Betelheimer, legislative agent of the Society of Veterans of Foreign Wars, are on the ground and of course pulling every leg in sight. The former is quoted as saying:

The overwhelming majority given in the House shows that the representatives, close to the heart of the people, realize the justness of the measure, and in spite of the highly organized propaganda in opposition know the great mass of Americans want this debt to the veterans paid, and paid now. Any measure which has been twice passed by the lower house by overwhelming majorities and made the unfinished business of the Senate is at once inevitable legislation.

Mr. Betelheimer speaks in a tone less unctuous, but more suggestive of fighting spirit:

We are going to concentrate on the Senate now and urge immediate hearings on the bonus bill. There can't be any dilly-dallying because the time is getting late and we want our bonus before this session of Congress ends. We have our best men working on the Senate now and we find most of the senators very receptive.

Expert observers get the impression that these promoters of quick action are in for a period of hard sledding. Members of the Senate are not so immediately interested in the November election, and in this as in other matters they have a more definite sense of their national responsibilities than members of the House. They are more likely to hearken to counsels from the head of the treasury and from the Administration than the more or less rag-tag-and-bobtail membership of the House. Secretary Mellon is of course in close touch with the Senate Finance Committee and with leading members of the Senate, and his emphatic and sustained protest against the proposed legislation is likely to have serious weight. The President has given no indication of his attitude, further than his declaration of a month ago pointing out that he could see no feasible method of financing the bonus proposal other than that of a general sales tax. His practice is not to pass judgment on matters pending in advance of enactment, but from his former expressions inference is plain that he does not approve the measure as it passed the House. Many members in the Senate are not committed, and their disposition is to look to Mr. Harding for guidance.

The Senate may be depended upon not to follow the example of the House in consideration of this measure. Whatever its ultimate fate may be, it will not be "jammed" through. Gag rule will not be applied and there will be no interference with the disposition of senators to offer amendments. The one certain thing is that the whole project will be thoroughly threshed over in debate when the bill shall get before the Senate.

In the meantime opposition to the raid is obviously gaining strength throughout the country. The manner in which it has been presented, the threats made in its urgency, the pitiful subserviency of a majority of the members of the House—these conditions and incidents have created a profound and a profoundly adverse sentiment. It would be going too far to say that the movement is now universally recognized as an indefensible raid upon the treasury, but it is certain that many in and out of Congress so regard it. Opposition sentiment on the part of ex-service men is also making itself heard, and even many members of the House who voted for the bill under pressure of their fears have gained light from the snowstorm of approving telegrams and letters that have come to the courageous ones who voted in opposition.

The country now pretty generally understands that this measure is first of all only a political hold-up; further, that public sentiment is generally against it, that it threatens serious disturbance in the movement back to "normalcy," that it is an embarrassment to the responsible Administration, and that it is repugnant to sober judgment. But there remains one matter to which attention has not emphatically been called, and that is the cost of the machinery that would be required to carry out the programme as defined. Under the proposal claims are to be presented by not less than 4,250,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines scattered in all parts of the world. Each of these claims would have to be checked up with the records; proper blanks would have to be filled out and orders issued for payment of the sums to which the men—and certain women, too—would be entitled. It is estimated that in the simplest case at least four letters would have to pass between the departments and the claimants. The minimum number of letters would be 20,000,000, no small item for the Postoffice Department, when it is borne in mind that these letters would travel postage free. The present force of clerks would not be capable of carrying on this enormous correspondence. War Department officials estimate that it would require at least five thousand more clerks to handle the army claimants and the navy figures that it would require at least five hundred clerks to take care of its share of the business. When the army was demobilized it took five thousand extra clerks to arrange for the payment of the sixty-dollar bonus which was intended to help the soldiers get back to normal conditions. What the money cost of the enormous clerical and administrative machine would be nobody dares guess, but anybody who can visualize the work in its entirety can not fail to understand that it would call for an enormous sum.

A Russian's View of the Russian Situation.

Within the week the Argonaut has had the privilege of having a free talk with a distinguished Russian belonging to what may be termed the constructive, democratic element of that country, of course anti-Bolshe-vist. This gentleman, who may not be named, is of high individual authority and he is in constant touch through correspondence with the heart of Russia. In effect his judgment is that if the outer world will keep hands off and let nature take her course Russia will presently emerge from her troubles sound and whole. By presently, of course, he means a period of months that may stretch into a few years. He deplores all suggestions of military intervention, and particularly he denounces the Hugo Stinnes and other outside plans for economic restoration, all of which, he points out, are based upon the idea of establishing some form of mandate over his country. In the opinion of this careful observer the shell of Bolshevism which covers Russia is being worn thinner and thinner, presently to be cracked and destroyed by the new life that is germinating beneath the surface. Russia, he declares, is vibrating with this new life. His belief is that political reconstruction will work out by itself. His advices are to the effect that the Red army, already suffering in its morale, when it finds no armed enemies against it, will disintegrate and that gradually there will emerge a new Russia made up of a confederation of states in which liberty and property rights will be fully guaranteed. Further, the gentleman quoted is suspicious and fearful of any attempt by Europe to help in the reconstruction of Russia. His own view is that the United States is the only unselfish friend of the Russian people. It will be, he declares, to America that the new Russia will turn for capital and skill when it enters upon the period of wholesome development which he sees just around the corner. Russia wants nothing, says our informant, in the way of charity, but when it shall become stabilized it will offer an attractive field for American enterprise and for the employment of American capital.

Hope at Last.

One of the worst of modern tyrannies is that of the "booster" in a small town. He will destroy any natural beauty and anything fine in his environment to add a few dollars to the price of real estate. He will kill trees in the hope of profit, and sacrifice the wooded banks of streams to make his village look like every other village. He takes his ideas of beauty and of what he calls progress from little rings of street contractors and cement sidewalk men. His highest artistic aspiration is a city hall with a dome on it like every other city hall and county courthouse in the country. His great god is progress, which is usually a humbug. His favorite verb is "boost," which is a vulgar and disgusting word because it stands for a vulgar and disgusting thing. If you criticize his ways he will damn you for an old barnacle and a drag upon civilization. In conspiracy with the small town merchant who wants a profit, not only on the potatoes he sells, but on the real estate where he sells them, he is desperately hard to subdue, and few efforts have been made to suppress him. But all overstrained patience snaps at last, and at the pretty little town of Carmel-by-the-Sea, chosen home of authors and artists, rebellion has broken out against further vulgarization through the cheat and imposture of needless public improvements. The people who live in Carmel and support the merchants and "boosters" with their trade went there to live because they loved it as it was, with its sandy roads that curve lovingly past old oaks and pines, its sidewalks that are intimate little Indian trails, its dunes and its seascapes and its placid, homey life, untroubled by the roar and grind of business. Having bought and paid for the environment they loved, they are now threatened by the humbug of "progress." The "boosters" have decreed that the oaks and pines must come down so the streets can be graded, curbed, and paved like Market Street, and that there must be a city hall where the politicians can do their loafing more conveniently. This has incited three bold patriots to run for the town council on a platform promising to "keep Carmel off the map," to preserve its old trees, its soft roads, its winding trails, and its delightful freedom from lamp posts and a city hall; in other words, its reticence, its dignity, and its beauty. They are everlastingly right. One of them says: "If you think that a glass factory is of greater value to the town than a sand dune, if you truly want Carmel-by-the-Sea to become a booming metropolis, don't vote for me." If this intelligent effort is successful at the polls, it will probably, however, defeat one of its own objects. Carmel will be decidedly on the map, for other towns similarly afflicted will wish to know how emancipation was accomplished, and how all this pseudo-progress came to receive the well-earned axe.

Editorial Notes

A writer in the current Forum discusses the question, "Is Drink Killing England?" Without fear of provoking even passing discussion we venture to say that if drink could kill England, England would now be one with Nineveh and Tyre, and the lion and the lizard would undoubtedly keep the pubs wherein she gloried and drank deep.

The war and its aftermath has made wholesale havoc among the dynasties of Central Europe. There remains only one Central European state with a sovereign—Lichtenstein, which lies between Austria and Switzerland, a state so small that it can be traversed in a motor-car in twenty minutes. In 1914 there were forty-one dynasties in the world. Twenty-four lost their thrones during the war. The German princes, including the Kaiser and the Crown Prince, abdicated as individuals only. Not one of the Hohenzollerns or other dynasties who ruled over the central parts of Germany abdicated in the name of the entire family.

General Leonard Wood appears to be doing a man's job in the Philippines, according to statements of Justice E. Finley Johnson of the supreme court of the islands. He has won the coöperation of the island peoples, reduced the annual expenses of government by about $25,000,000, started repairing its dilapidated finances, speeded up the administration of justice, and set afoot measures to control the rinderpest among the work animals; a good deal for one man to do in a few months. General Wood must have had to begin by undoing a great deal of the work of his predecessor and restoring the prestige and authority of the American administrators in the islands. In no other way could such satisfactory progress be explained.

Captain F. E. Guest, Secretary of the British Air Ministry, declared in the House of Commons last week that the next war, "if it comes," will be a war of giant airplanes scattering bombs of incredible power and rendering navies and armies practically obsolete. He insists that the British air force must be prepared to meet the first clash of war, since "air men will be two hundred miles away in the first action before the first reservist has caught a train or the first battleship has got up steam." Captain Guest outlined the probability of airplanes carrying small forces of artillery and infantry. He said: "In ten years' time combats between the forces of the air will be grotesquely and pathetically one-sided affairs." Colonial Secretary Winston Churchill, supporting Captain Guest, said that had the late war lasted a few months longer operations against Berlin would have been conducted by Great Britain with vastly improved airships. He added that full development had never been reached "owing to our running short of enemies."

The last consignment of bodies of American soldiers who died in France was dispatched from Brest on the 22d of last month. The total number of bodies returned is 45,023. Agents of the army who have been carrying on the work of collecting and dispatching the bodies have gone to England, where there are ninety-seven bodies of American soldiers who died in widely scattered parts of the British Isles. Some 500 other bodies of Americans, whose relatives have decided to leave them in England, will be concentrated in a permanent cemetery at Broadwood, Surrey, where the British government has given a site. There will remain permanently in France something more than 30,000 American dead. An elaborate scheme of beautification has been devised by a special commission for the four cemeteries in France which have been given over by the French government. The four "Fields of Honor" are: Suresnes Cemetery, near Paris; Bony, near San Quentin; Belleau Wood, near Château-Thierry, and the Argonne or Romagne cemetery, near Romagne-sous-Montfaucon. Each cemetery will have a resting house and chapel for visitors and the graves will be marked by uniform headstones. The French people continue to exhibit the kindest attitude toward the American graves. A Sunday never goes by without scores of French folk visiting the cemeteries and placing flowers upon the graves. The bodies that have been sent home and those that will remain on French soil have been gathered from more than five hundred cemeteries throughout France, Alsace-Lorraine, and Germany. A permanent office will be maintained in Paris for the convenience of American visitors.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Religion and India.

LOS GATOS, CAL., March 26, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In the Argonaut of March 18th, F. M. T. dwells on "The Troubles of India," giving an interesting series of facts about England's attempt to bring order out of chaos in ruling a strange alien people. The troubles are not all in India, but in England's and the writer's failure to appreciate the Oriental mind. "India is religion," quoting a German historian—here the Argonaut's correspondent approaches the secret. But he does not seem to realize that religion must be permitted the language of poetry. This is necessary because religion tries to express in words the depths of sympathy, compassion, love, and fellow-feeling that lie just beyond the realm of words. The truths of religion are borderland truths and belong in the "empire of silence," as Thomas Carlyle often said. In this world India is supreme. But when language is used, it takes the form of exaggeration which the Occidental mind does not grasp. Just see what F. M. T., as a Western thinker, makes out of Gautama Siddhartha's appreciation of motherhood and the nourishing of young life. This principle is foremost in every native religion.

"There may be no truth in the legend, but the spirit of India, if there is such a thing, is probably best presented to the imagination by the story of the sad and beautiful end of Gotama Buddha, to the effect that in pursuit of a spiritual ideal he fed himself to a hungry tigress so that she might furnish milk to her cubs: thereby reducing the number of men and increasing the number of tigers. A policy that works out that way is about the sort of statecraft that would naturally appeal to Ghandi and his idealistic followers."

Only a dry-as-dust theologian may be permitted the "thereby." The literal-minded West does not catch the spirit of compassionate love, with its "thereby." As well ask why Jesus did not report the robbery on the Jericho Road. Every religious parable is subject to the same left-handed interpretation.

There is such a thing as the spirit of India. It lives in a real world beyond words, which is religion. Words conceal or reveal religion, but are not the essence of a Fourth Dimension which might best be described as Silence. Mr. Ghandi, physically speaking, is the weakest of men. Sitting on his Oriental rug dressed in the cheapest garments, he has a power that is baffling. That power can not be revealed to the Western mind until a reality is admitted for that silence. The culture and scholarship of England in appreciating this reality in the past has been her strength in India. Many times it served her, more often than her sword. Can it be that this scholarship is waning, and that her leaders see nothing but foolishness in India and her holy men?

India's reality says to England: Thus far and no farther! The respect for that invisible line, foolishness it may seem to us, will save India and England as well.

Here Is Common Sense.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 25, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: The controversy that seems to be disturbing the City of Berkeley and the State University over the site for the new Stadium has apparently halted the progress of the whole matter, and it may be well to reconsider what many of us have already thought, and that is, "Why build two stadiums within fifty miles of each other?"

To the ordinary individual it seems like a waste of money, and judging from present criticisms there is no good place for the proposed new stadium near the university in Berkeley.

There is only one event in the year that demands a big stadium, and if it were a hundred miles away it would be an easy matter to crowd a large amphitheatre for the big football game, and any one who wants to see the big game could see it at Palo Alto.

If capital and interest mean anything to either the state or Stanford, or to the public, then there is no reason on earth for spending a million dollars on another big stadium that is empty and lonesome 728 days out of every two years. Every one seems convinced that a very small grandstand would seat all the enthusiasts for any other event than the big game.

The writer is a subscriber and is not trying to get his money back, but would prefer to donate it to some deficiency fund.

Hiram Johnson, Dissenter.

(Houston (Texas) Chronicle, March 3d.)

It has taken the country ten years to find out that Hiram Johnson is a dissenter, not a progressive. There is no telling how long it will take California, though next fall's vote should offer a hint.

But first let it be acknowledged that Hiram Johnson has made his mark in the world; a jagged, zigzag, noisy mark; a mark which is the more disappointing because it promised so much.

In 1912 he blossomed out as running mate to Theodore Roosevelt, which was some introduction for so young and inexperienced a man. The country gave him a splendid reception, all things considered, and many people jumped to the conclusion that they beheld another President in the making. Perchance, Mr. Johnson himself was one of these.

That was in the heyday of progressivism, when the country had not learned to distinguish a chronic kicker from men who disagreed with prevailing conditions only because they thought they had something better to offer.

Even four years later, when Hiram Johnson posed as the silent nemesis of Mr. Hughes, the country failed to discern his grouching. "He is an independent," murmured the mass, "willing to take a chance for his convictions, not bound by party affiliations."

But in 1919, when this same Hiram Johnson turned his venomous tongue against that Wilson whom he had helped elect, the country found itself suspecting things, and now that he is taking a similar course toward President Harding, the country is still more suspicious.

With whom does Hiram Johnson agree? With what policy is he in accord?

There is an impassable gulf of difference between a progressive and a dissenter. The one is a constructive thinker, the other an opportunist.

A progressive dissents only when it becomes necessary. A dissenter is a progressive only when it is convenient.

A progressive knows what he wants, and is for it. A dissenter waits to see what somebody else wants, and is against it.

We do not believe that Hiram Johnson speaks the language of California. We do not believe that he is typical of that purposeful, optimistic spirit which has developed on the Pacific Coast. We do not believe that he can continue to lead four million along the paths of aimless kick and discord much longer.

VOICES FROM THE PRESS.

IT DEPENDS ON WHO KNOWS WHAT.

(New York Times.)

The strange remarks made last week by the British Ambassador at the University of California may be accounted for by the fact that he was speaking as a professor to professors. Only as the expression of an inferiority complex can one explain his assertion:

"The vast majority of men in public life in mental capacity and knowledge are far behind the best minds and the best thought as represented by the highly specialized university professor. That knowledge which is power is not present in our governments today."

Knowledge was noticeably present in most governments only a few years ago, at the end of the war and after. It could plausibly be argued that Mr. Wilson's knowledge was actually a source of weakness. He knew more than most people, and knew that he knew it; conceivably some of his failures to win the support of public sentiment were due to this fact. Also, the public knew that Mr. Wilson was a best mind, and reacted accordingly in distrust. The deliberations of the wise men who controlled the Republican convention of 1920—and who, if they had wished, could have thrown the nomination to a professor—did not suggest any great conviction that knowledge is power.

Where are the professors who embellished the British war government? Sir Auckland is about the only survivor; and, though it could be maintained that highly specialized knowledge is the source of Mr. Lloyd George's strength, it is not a knowledge of anything that is taught in universities. And citizens of New York, contemplating the results of the last municipal election and reading of the new functions of the City Hall in the censorship of art and history, will feel that the British Ambassador has got the proposition reversed. Power is knowledge; a plurality of 400,000 confers omniscience.

THE PIT AND THE PENDULUM.

(Portland Oregonian.)

The strike of 600,000 employees of the bituminous coal mines is the result of one of those efforts at readjustment which are compelled by the change from war to peace conditions. Union miners demand continuation of the present rates of pay and reduction of working hours from forty-eight to thirty a week. Operators say that the union scale is 40 per cent. higher than that paid at non-union mines; that the latter are taking away their customers, and that they must reduce wages in order to stay in business and make any profit at all. They say that wages must be readjusted, and they are ready for a strike in confidence that within three months it will have this effect, while existing stocks of coal are sufficient to keep industry and railroads running.

Operators oppose government intervention on the ground that it is unnecessary, as there will be no shortage of fuel and as the parties immediately concerned and those dependent on them or doing business with them will be the only losers. It is impossible that a great industry employing such a large number of men and spread over many states can suddenly become idle without other bad effects. Though the season of maximum employment in other industries is opening, those industries can not absorb all of the several million unemployed. Undoubtedly many of them will be tempted to work in the mines. Experience teaches that the strikers will not regard with indifference any movement to supplant them, and that disorder is likely to follow.

A DEFENSE OF THAT BLOC.

(Pacific Rural Press.)

In connection with the claim that public affairs should be safeguarded and administered by those who have the best scientific knowledge and thinking ability and not wholly legislated for by lawyers, who know only law, and administered by professional office-holders, who only know how to get office, it is pertinent to suggest that the population-group of Americans which has recently made most notable progress toward expert legislation is the organized farmers of this country. Their representatives in Washington and in this state have been proceeding some time upon the policy of taking stands, not upon what they may fancy are their right and privileges, but upon what the most careful research by experts proves to be such. In making their conditions and requirements known they have put into practice what, according to Dr. Geddes' thesis, is the ideal way, viz: to arrive at the best knowledge by scientific research and to issue no authorized declarations or demands until such basis for them is demonstrated. It was the adoption of this wise policy and the demonstrations which flowed from it which induced the legislators of the "agricultural bloc" at Washington to associate themselves as they have done and to secure the legislation which they already have and will continue to bring through on the basis of demonstration of truth and fairness. The old agricultural policy of class-pleading filled the dome of the national capitol with oratory; the new agricultural policy of setting forth the best knowledge for the guidance of legislators is not only filling the pages of the statute books with laws, but is affording a basis for better executive policies. The best knowledge in farming is the secret of its internal progress and success; the best knowledge of farming exalts the industry in public esteem and insures its prosperity.

OUR POLITICAL BAROMETER.

(New York Herald.)

The triumph of the Republican candidate for Congress, John E. Nelson, in the Third Maine District Monday over Ernest L. McLean, the Democratic candidate, is not a thing to make Republicans throughout the country feel that they have a walkover in the Congress elections this fall.

In 1920 this same district gave John A. Peters a plurality of 19,000. Now it gives 6500. In 1920 Peters had the advantage of the presidential vote and the Republican landslide, so no worth-while conclusion can be drawn from the wide contrast in these two votes.

But in previous Congress elections we get figures which in contrast with those of the Monday election throw some light on the matter. In 1914 the Republican plurality was only 1515, but that was when the national government was Democratic and it came close on the heels of the Republican-Progressive party split of 1912. There was still much feeling between the two elements at the time of that election. Moreover, there was no woman vote, as there was no woman vote in 1916, when the Peters plurality was 3654. And in 1916 the Progressives were not enthusiasts in their support of the old party.

In 1918 the Peters plurality was 5363, and without the woman vote. While the New York Herald hasn't the figures giving the woman vote in Monday's election it thinks it approximately safe to say that 40 per cent. of the 23,000 votes cast were from women. Deducting this 40 per cent. from Nelson's plurality of 6500 leaves but 3900 in contrast with the Peters plurality of 5363 in 1918.

A further fact that has a bearing on the Monday election is that it was a special election to fill a vacancy—not a regular election when politics is boiling. The total vote cast on Monday was less than half that cast in the same district in 1920. Considered all in all the result of this Maine elec-

A safe indication of what will happen this fall in the Congress elections.

THE BONUS. (The World's Work.)

The other of the two most dangerous economic proposals before Congress is the soldiers' bonus. This measure is economically unsound, essentially unpatriotic, and subversive of both public and private morals.

At present the plea for a bonus, or gift, or dole, is being camouflaged under the softened term of "adjusted compensation." The ingenious argument for it runs like this: Five million young men, at the outset of promising careers, were suddenly seized by the government for the defense of the country and were kept for two years in uniform at thirty dollars a month, when they would otherwise have been earning more than this amount and would also have been gaining two years' momentum toward their careers. At the same time, so the argument runs, millions of older men beyond draft age, and millions of young men who were either slackers or physically disqualified, enjoyed the high wages of the war period and occupied the jobs left by the men who went into uniform. Therefore, the men in uniform should now have the lost earnings of those two years equalized to them in the form of "adjusted compensation," in cash or in equivalent advantages.

The argument is obviously fallacious as a generalization. There is no assurance that the great majority of the men in uniform could have earned more than thirty dollars a month, plus all living expenses, if they had been out of uniform. It is, on the contrary, quite certain that if they had stayed out of uniform they would soon have been working under German task-masters for very much less than a dollar a day. And it is clear that "adjusted compensation" is a meaningless term—to "adjust" a drafted day-laborer's lost wages by the same gift of a lump sum as you "adjust" a drafted expert accountant's lost wages is no "adjustment" at all.

But go deeper into the political morals of the issue. To read the arguments of the proponents of the bonus, one would think that the soldiers regarded themselves in the same light as the Hessians who sold their services to George the Third. There is much talk of having "fought the country's battles," but no suggestion that after all it was their own country they fought for. The attitude is rather that of hired mercenaries who, having answered successfully a stranger's call for police protection, come now to present that stranger's bill.

It was said above that the bonus is subversive of public and private morals. One has only to recall our experience with civil war pensions to realize what this means.

The American Legion was organized with many fair words about its social and patriotic virtues. It early went on record with a pledge that it would keep out of politics and especially out of the pension game of grab. The movement for so-called "adjusted compensation" is discreditable hedging upon that pledge. It is like the first drink of liquor to a man who can not restrain his appetite. If human nature has not changed, and if our experience with past wars means anything, the public has only to yield to this first demand to find that it has created a vicious habit in millions of men who will then grow unashamed to ask for unearned gifts under the name of "service pensions" and other terms disguising a mere acceptance of charity from the common funds. The effects of this habit upon the individual are notorious.

Nothing here said is intended to oppose immediate assistance to men injured in the service or permanent positions to men permanently incapacitated by their service. They deserve their country's aid, and anything the Legion can do in their behalf will receive the support of the public. But men who suffered no physical or mental injury in the war have no just claim upon the public's money.

THE FOUNTAIN-HEAD OF TRUTH. (Los Angeles Times.)

If you desire to know "the exact truth" concerning the "constructive governmental work of the state" apply to Governor Stephens or any member of the state machine. Such is, in substance, a statement issued by Fulton Lane, president of the Public Affairs Lyceum. * * *

How nice! If you want to know "the exact truth" about why California has the highest per capita tax of any state in the Union do not ask the wicked Los Angeles Times or the State Taxpayers' Association or any member of the legislature who opposed the King tax bill two years ago—do not ask those who pay the money, but the ones who spend it. If you want to know anything about the Forty Fat Commissions, if you want "the exact truth," ask one of the commissioners. They alone are disinterested parties; they alone are without prejudice. They are all "public-spirited citizens," and they all have sufficient leisure to go anywhere in the state, at any time, and tell you all about it.

The Times hesitates as to whether to call this naïveté or gall. These pay-roll patriots are either more verdant than the Southern California countryside in April or they believe the Southern California electorate to be more credulous than those who answer advertisements in a matrimonial magazine.

SELF-PROPAGATING PATERNALISM. (Santa Barbara Daily News.)

Thomas Babbington Macaulay was considered, in his day, something of a thinker. If he had lived in the present century he would have been an old fogey, decidedly behind the times, and would have trained with the has-beens.

In one of his essays he drew upon his imagination for the grotesque and the impossible. He said: "Why should not they take away the child from the mother, select the nurse, regulate the school, overlook the playground, fix the hours of labor and of recreation, prescribe what ballads shall be sung, what tunes shall be played, what books shall be read, what physics shall be swallowed? Why should they not choose our wives, limit our expenses and stint us to a certain number of dishes of meat, of glasses of wine, and of cups of tea?" * * *

The only portion of the prophecy of Macaulay that has not come true is that of the husband selecting a wife, and the wife a husband. As yet a man is permitted to select his own wife, and a woman is permitted as yet to select her own husband, without interference by the police.

In the city of Santa Barbara no one escapes. Everything in the moral, industrial, and commercial world is to be owned, operated, supervised, or censored, from the birth of a baby to the burial of a human body. A man can not establish a grocery without getting the consent of the council of the city of Santa Barbara, and to get that consent he must first secure the assent of a majority of the owners of property within 400 feet of the location of the proposed store.

The Congress of the United States has within the past ten years expended four billions of dollars in the maintenance of commissions, boards, and bureaus, the bulk of which has been squandered in doing for the people that which it would have been much better for them to have done for themselves.

The desire to attend to other people's business grows by that upon which it feeds; the cost of these commissions is increasing yearly, and doubling every five years.

Would it not be a good thing to now establish a commission whose object is to get rid of commissions? Why not fight fire with fire? Why not get the antidote for the snake-bite from the snake?

INDIVIDUALITIES.

W. Reid Dick is the sculptor of the Viscount Bryce bust to be presented to the American people through the famous Sulgrave Institute.

Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry, an English actress, is a pioneer in the new field of actress-managing. She is one of the first women to manage a theatre in London.

On April 27th, the 100th anniversary of the birth of General U. S. Grant, a new statue of the great American soldier will be unveiled in Washington by the Princess Cantacuzene, the general's granddaughter.

George B. Lockwood, editor of the National Republican, has been made secretary of the Republican National Committee, succeeding Clarence Miller, whose death occurred a short time ago.

The new Italian premier, the Hon. Luigi Facta, a lieutenant of the former prime minister, Giolitti, has had a brilliant career as a journalist and a lawyer. His cabinet is remarkable for the impartial representation of different factions.

Miss Edwina Ashley, England's greatest heiress, is reported engaged to Lord Louis Mount Batten of the Prince of Wales' staff in India. Miss Ashley is the granddaughter of Sir Ernest Cassel, who left her a hundred million pounds.

Even Turkey has produced its "greatest woman." Halide Edib Hanoum, educator, poetess, and politician, is a powerful influence in that country. Halide has a finger in every Turkish political pie. She is greatly concerned over the national status quo.

Samuel Glucksman, a sergeant of the Sixth Marines, has been decorated by every Allied government for his distinguished service during the world war. One of his feats was the capture of twenty Germans single-handed in an engagement at Mont Blanc.

Cyril W. Armstrong, a traveling salesman, newspaper reporter, and an attorney of Chicago, recently fell heir to a large estate in Africa accompanied by a British title. It is said that Mr. Armstrong is wavering between the alternative of being an English earl or an American citizen.

Sir Ross Macpherson Smith, the Australian aviator, who has just published the record of his flight from England to Australia in 1919, and who made another pioneer flight from Cairo to Calcutta in 1918, is a young man of thirty with a string of war-won honors after his name. Sir Ross is a noted Australian sportsman.

The career of Lord Reading, the British Viceroy in India since 1921, has been that of one of the most brilliant lawyers of his generation. As Mr. Rufus Isaacs he was for many years a Member of Parliament for the town of Reading. He served as Solicitor-General, Attorney-General, and in 1913 he was Lord Chief Justice of England. In 1910 he had been made a baron and in 1917 he assumed his present title of Earl of Reading. He was high commissioner and special ambassador at Washington in 1918. He was sent as Viceroy to India because of his great administrative and political ability. Incidentally, Lord Reading was the first Attorney-General to take his place as a cabinet member, 1912.

Senator Frank Bosworth Brandegee, who has stood for reservations in the treaties, is one of the most influential Republicans in the Senate. A typical Connecticut man and a Yale graduate, Mr. Brandegee has been in Republican politics since his admission to the bar in 1888. After service in the legislature and the House of Representatives he entered the Senate in 1905 at the age of forty. A Republican who stoutly supported the treaties is Senator Frank B. Kellogg of Minnesota. Mr. Kellogg was a distinguished lawyer at St. Paul and an influential Republican before entering upon public office. He was elected to the Senate in 1916 and will therefore come up for reelection this year. Mr. Kellogg is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Selma Lagerlöf, who has recently returned to the forefront of European letters, enjoys a unique place among women writers. She is the only woman so far to receive the Nobel Prize for literature, and she is a member of the Royal Swedish Academy. Born in 1858, the daughter of a Swedish army officer, Miss Lagerlöf was educated to be a teacher and taught for ten years before her unusual talents were discovered. From 1895 she devoted herself exclusively to writing and travel. Though she is chiefly known to English readers by "Gösta Berling's Saga" and "Jerusalem," Miss Lagerlöf has been an industrious and prolific writer. "The Outcasts," which is now attracting attention to the Swedish authoress, is only her second latest book. Miss Lagerlöf is not a prophet unhonored in her own country. In addition to the two honors already mentioned she has been created Doctor honoris causa by the Upsala University and is by virtue of that degree the Honorable Selma Lagerlöf, Dr. Phil.

Dr. William Henry Welch, head of the School of Hygiene and Public Health of Johns Hopkins University, which has done such notable work in preventive medicine since its foundation in 1916, is one of the most brilliant and distinguished pathologists in the United States. His string of degrees is monotonous. There are fifteen or sixteen of them and they include recognition by practically all the great medical schools of Europe and America. In addition to his long active hospital service at Bellevue Hospital Medical College and at Johns Hopkins Hospital, he is president of the Maryland State Board of Health, president of the board of directors of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, trustee of the Carnegie Institute, and a member or a fellow of a score or so of the other medical associations. Dr. Welch served as a colonel in the world war and was awarded the D. S. M. for his services in the American Red Cross. He is the author of a number of works on pathological subjects. The special school of hygiene and public health at Johns Hopkins is the pioneer school of preventive medicine in this country.

Let Us Be Merry Before We Go.

If sadly thinking, with spirits sinking,
Could, more than drinking, my cares compose
A cure for sorrow from sighs I'd borrow,
And hope tomorrow would end my woes.
But as in wailing there's nought availing,
And Death unfeeling will strike the blow,
Then for that reason, and for a season,
Let us be merry before we go.

To joy a stranger, a wayward ranger,
In every danger my course I've run;
Now hope all ending, and death befriending,
His last aid lending, my cares are done.
No more a rover, or hapless lover,
My griefs are over—my glass runs low;
Then for that reason, and for a season,
Let us be merry before we go.

—John Philpot Curran.

A Song for St. Cecilia's Day, 1687.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began:
When nature underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay,
And could not heave her head,
The tuneful voice was heard from high,
"Arise, ye more than dead!"
Then cold, and hot, and moist, and dry,
In order to their stations leap,
And Music's power obey.
From harmony, heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in Man.

What passion cannot Music raise and quell?
When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wondering, on their faces fell
To worship that celestial sound:
Less than a God they thought there could not dwell
Within the hollow of that shell,
That spoke so sweetly, and so well.
What passion cannot Music raise and quell?

The trumpet's loud clangour
Excites us to arms,
With shrill notes of anger,
And mortal alarms.
The double double double beat
Of the thundering drum
Cries Hark! the foes come;
Charge, charge, 'tis too late to retreat!
The soft complaining flute,
In dying notes, discovers
The woes of hopeless lovers,
Whose dirge is whisper'd by the warbling lute.

Sharp violins proclaim
Their jealous pangs and desperation,
Fury, frantic indignation,
Depth of pains, and height of passion,
For the fair, disdainful dame.

But O, what art can teach,
What human voice can reach,
The sacred organ's praise?
Notes inspiring holy love,
Notes that wing their heavenly ways
To mend the choirs above.

Orpheus could lead the savage race;
And trees unrooted left their place;
Squacious of the lyre;
But bright Cecilia rais'd the wonder higher:
When to her organ vocal breath was given,
An angel heard, and straight appear'd
Mistaking Earth for Heaven.

GRAND CHORUS.

As from the power of sacred lays,
The spheres began to move,
And sung the great Creator's praise
To all the Blest above;
So when the last and dreadful hour
This crumbling pageant shall devour,
The trumpet shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live, the living die,
And Music shall untune the sky!—John Dryden.

Misconceptions.

This is a spray the Bird clung to,
Making it blossom with pleasure,
Ere the high tree-top she sprung to,
Fit for her nest and her treasure.
O, what a hope beyond measure
Was the poor spray's, which the flying feet hung to,—
So to be singled out, built in, and sung to!

This is a heart the Queen leant on,
Thrill'd in a minute erratic,
Ere the true bosom she bent on,
Meet for love's regal dalmatic.
O, what a fancy ecstatic
Was the poor heart's, ere the wanderer went on—Love to be saved for it, proffer'd to, spent on!

—Robert Browning.

VANITAS VANITATUM.

"A Gentleman with a Duster" Now Polishes Off a Few Ecclesiastics.

"A Gentleman with a Duster," having dry-cleaned society and trained a high-power hose on politics, has replaced his more potent tools with a chamois skin. We now witness his delicate operation on "painted windows." Having got more or less used to his mordant methods in the past, it is with trepidation that one watches him in the act of delicately polishing off the translucent, but evidently according to our energetic author, alas! not transparent, personality of the religious of today. It may as well be said at the outset that those who relished the anonymous author's exposé of the aristocracy and the government may come to "Painted Windows" hoping for more. But they will either go disappointed or remain to pray. Our own immediate reaction to the book was to envy England for boasting such a galaxy of saints. "Painted Windows"—the title—implies deliberate darkness. It implies, not merely an interior where light is kept out by the chrome, vermillion, and cobalt of ecclesiasticism, but where even their darkening hues are enfonce by the dust of ages. Strange it is then that most of the personalities so deftly placed before us here are radiant even in their filtered light. Is it possible that "A Gentleman with a Duster" himself entered the church flourishing the implements of his trade—but remained to pay his devotions? The query inevitably presents itself as one passes one saintly portrait after another, mostly saints who themselves sound angelic clarions of reform. What does "A Gentleman with a Duster" want? Even he seems intensely to admire most of his victims:

When our day is done, and men look back to the shadows we have left behind us, and there is no longer any spell of personal magnetism to delude right judgment, I think that the figure of Dean Inge may emerge from the dim and too crowded tapestry of our period with something of the force, richness, and abiding strength which gives Dr. Johnson his great place among authentic Englishmen.

Dean Inge repays observation and study. He is distinctly a "character." His appearance is minutely described here; and indeed a large part of the charm of "Painted Windows" is the intimate acquaintance one makes with these dignitaries of the church as people rather than as ecclesiastics. Does the author expect a saint to have canceled human nature? Probably the false premise is in assuming that human nature can produce a saint. Be that as it may, we think Dean Inge is a near cousin to one. This description of his appearance bears us out:

Few public men, with perhaps the exception of Samuel Rogers, ever cared so little about appearance. It is believed that the dean would be indistinguishable from a tramp but for the constant admonishment and active benevolence of Mrs. Inge. As it is, he is something more than shabby, and only escapes a disreputable appearance by the finest of hairs, resembling, as I have suggested, one of those poor Russian noblemen whom Dostoevsky loved to place in the dismal and sordid atmosphere of a lodging-house, there to shine like golden planets by the force of their ideas.

Even our author, keen in pursuit of an exposé, expresses himself admiringly as follows:

Let no man suppose that the intellectual virtues are outside the range of religion. "Candor, moral courage, intellectual honesty, scrupulous accuracy, chivalrous fairness, endless docility to facts, disinterested collaboration, unconquerable hopefulness and perseverance, manly renunciation of popularity and easy honors, love of bracing labor and strengthening solitude; these, and many other cognate qualities," says Baron von Hügel, "bear upon them the impress of God and His Christ." What Dr. Inge, who quotes these words, says of Plotinus declares his own character. He speaks of "the intense honesty of the man, who never shirks a difficulty or writes an insincere word."

And yet "A Gentleman with a Duster" feels that there is something wrong somewhere. He craves perfection:

I feel myself that his mind is made up, though he is still thinking and still seeking; and I attribute his indecision as a leader, his want of weight in the affairs of mankind, to one fatal deficiency in his mysticism. It is, I presume to suggest, a mysticism which is separated by no gulf from egoism—egoism of the highest order and the most spiritual character, but still egoism. In his quest of God he is not conscious of others. He thinks of mankind with interest, not with affection. Humanity is a spectacle, not a brotherhood.

The author's discovery of a "fatal deficiency in his mysticism" is nevertheless in direct contrast to this revelation:

I have spoken to him about psychical research and the modern interest in spiritualism. "I don't think much of that!" he replied. Then, in a lower key, "It was not through animism and necromancy that the Jews came to believe in immortality." How did they reach that belief? "By thinking things out, and asking the question, Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

In fact we think that our purifying gentleman is inconsistent in the extreme, for he takes issue with the austere dean at the very quality that typifies his saintliness:

But he lacks that profound sympathy with the human race which gives to moral decisiveness the creative energy of the great fighter. A lesser man than Erasmus left a greater mark on the sixteenth century.

He then confounds confusion by quoting Bacon: "The nobler a soul is, the more objects of compassion it hath." Granted Bacon's ethical infallibility, he yet referred to worldly people. The farther a "saint" progresses from worldly interests and towards asceticism, the more he loses touch with human joys and ills. One must be reasonable in one's demands.

One of the most interesting figures among these "studies in religious personality," partly because it is that of a woman, partly because it is that of a true religious perfectly balanced with sanity, is that of Miss Maude Royden:

Pushkin said that Russia turned an Asian face towards Europe and a European face towards Asia.

This acute saying may be applied to Miss Royden. To the prosperous and timid Christian she appears as a dangerous evangelist of socialism, and to the fiery socialist as a tame and sentimental apostle of Christianity. As in the case of Russia, so in the case of this interesting and courageous woman; one must go to neither extremity, neither to the bourgeoisie nor to the apacherie, if one would discover the truth of her nature.

For his own part, "A Gentleman with a Duster" is all praise of Miss Royden's beautiful character. For our part, we did not know that such a combination of all the virtues was possible:

Miss Royden's memoirs, if they are ever written, would have, I think, the rather unusual merit of pleasing both saints and sinners; the saints by the depth and beauty of her spiritual experience, the sinners by her freedom from every shade of cant and by her strong, almost masculine, sympathy with the difficulties of our human nature. Catherine the Great, in her colloquies with the nervous and hesitating Diderot, used to say, "Proceed; between men all is allowable." One may affirm of Miss Royden that she is at once a true woman and a great man.

Her life has been one of unusual interest. Born the daughter of Sir Thomas Royden of Frankby Hall, Birkenhead, there was nothing in her early life or conventional heredity to forecast her remarkable future. Nothing, perhaps, but the fact that she was born lame:

Miss Royden, it should be said, had been prepared by a long experience of pain to feel sympathy with the sufferings of other people. Her mind had been lamentably plowed up ever since the dawn of memory to receive the divine grain of compassion.

At birth both her hips were dislocated, and lameness has been her lot all through life. Such was her spirit, however, that this saddening and serious affliction, dogging her days and nights with pain, seldom prevented her from joining in the vigorous games and sports of the Royden family. She was something of a boy even in those days, and pluck was the very centre of her science of existence.

The accident of compassion may have had much to do with her later vocation—she was until recently assistant preacher at the City Temple and has been a social worker since youth—but one likes to think that even if she had always enjoyed perfect health her noble spirit would have asserted itself:

Her first step towards a life of service was joining a Women's Settlement in Liverpool, a city which has wealth enough to impress and gratify the disciples of Mr. Samuel Smiles, and slums enough to excite and infuriate the disciples of Karl Marx. Here Miss Royden worked for three years, serving her novitiate as it were in the ministry of mercy, a notable figure in the dark streets of Liverpool, that eager little body, with its dragging leg, its struggling hips, its head held high to look the whole world in the face on the chance, nay, but in the hope, that a bright smile from eyes as clear as day might do some poor devil a bit of good.

One wonders what use the Gentleman has for his duster here.

Miss Royden has been active in suffrage work since 1908. It is rather strange that the suffragists have not made more of her allegiance. In England, where she is a familiar figure, her support ought to be a powerful one to any movement:

It is a grateful experience to sit with this woman, who is so like the best of men, but it is so manifestly the staunchest of women. Her face reveals the force of her emotions, her voice, which is musical and persuasive, the depth of her compassion. In her sitting-room, which is almost a study and nearly an office, hangs a portrait of Newman, and a prie-Dieu stands against one of the walls half-hidden by bookshelves. She is one of the few very busy people I have known who give one no feeling of an inward commotion.

Miss Royden is in strong contrast to the ecclesiastical type of Dean Inge. Where he is all austerity she is immensely human. With her the church, Christianity, is a means to an end, the objective being to help suffering humanity:

What men and women want to know in these days, Miss Royden assures me out of the richness of her great experience, is whether Christianity works, whether it does things. The majority of people, she feels sure, are looking about for "something that helps"—something that will strengthen men and women to fight down their lower nature, that will convince them that their higher nature is a reality, and that will give them a living sense of companionship in their difficult lives—lives often as drab and depressing as they are morally difficult.

Having shown us in the character of Dean Inge what a modern churchman should not be, one may reasonably assume that "A Gentleman with a Duster" regards Miss Royden as all that he or she should be:

Yet I feel fairly certain that she would admit, if pressed with the question, that the working of any better system can depend for its success only upon a much better humanity. For she is one of those who is bewildered by the selfishness of men and women, a brutal, arrogant, challenging, and wholly unashamed selfishness, which publicly seeks its own pleasures, publicly displays the offending symbols of its offensive wealth, publicly indulges itself in most shameful and infuriating luxuries, even at a time when children are dying like flies of starvation and pestilence, and while men of their own household, who fought to save civilization from the despotism of the Prussian theory, tramp the streets, hungry and bitter-hearted, looking for work.

Certainly there is no other justification for her portrait here than as a model of an exemplary life.

Neither our author nor we can wax so enthusiastic over Father Knox. Not being familiar with English ecclesiastical affairs, we do not know whether or not he is typical of the English Catholic priest. Probably it is true that the genius of the English race does not easily adapt itself to popery. Cape and surplice do not seem to become the British physique. It is problematical at best, but the fact remains that Father Knox strikes one as a worldly man who has accidentally become a priest:

There is a story that when Father Knox was an undergraduate at Oxford he sat down one day to choose whether he would be an agnostic or a Roman Catholic. "But is there not some doubt in the matter?" inquired a friend of mine, to whom I repeated the tale. "Did he really sit down and choose, or did he only toss up?"

Because he has not come to his calling with an open mind, and because according to our author he is afraid to open his mind, Father Knox preaches an archaic variety of mediæval lore which is as different from Dean Inge's spiritual message as the latter is from Miss Royden's humane one:

He seems to me one of the most pathetic examples I ever encountered of the ruin wrought by Fear. I think that the one motive of his life has been a constant terror of finding himself in the wrong. The door, which for Dr. Inge has no key, because it has no lock, is to Ronald Knox a door of terror which opens only to a single key—and a door which as surely shuts out from eternal life the soul that is wrong as the soul that is wicked. He must have certainty. He dare not contemplate the prospect of awaking one day to find his religious life "a ghastly mistake."

At last we find a use for the Gentleman's Duster. And the Gentleman himself seizes his opportunity with avidity. This is what he—and most of us—came for:

Every religion in history, from the worship of Osiris, Serapis, and Mithras to the loathsome rites practiced in the darkness of African forests, has been handed down as unquestionable truth commanding the loyalty of its disciples. What logic, what magic of holiness, could destroy a false religion if tradition is sacrosanct and all innovation of the devil?

We turn with relief to Archbishop Randall Davidson:

His grave earnestness is balanced by a conviction that humor is not without a serious purpose. He looks upon life in the average, avoiding all abnormality, and he sees the average with a genial smile. He thoroughly appreciates the oddities of English character, and would ask with Gladstone, "In what country except ours (as I know to have happened) would a Parish Ball have been got up in order to supply funds for a Parish Hearse?"

But again we suspect him of not being spiritual enough for the anonymous critic, whose anonymity, by the way, ought not to remain much longer in doubt. It should not be hard in so small a country as England to find a writer who knows intimately all the leading lights of the church. Any journalist might be familiar with Downing Street and any resident of Mayfair with a trenchant pen might expose the other residents, but surely few of either class must be familiar with the ecclesiastical worthies of the day.

Returning to Archbishop Davidson, a characteristically unspiritual story of him is as follows:

His attitude to the excitements and sensations of the passing day may be gathered from a simple incident. During the most heady days of the war, that is to say, days when people made least use of their heads, I encountered him at the country-house of a well-known statesman. One morning, while we were being lined up for a photograph, the board of our host came and forced himself between the archbishop and myself. "What would the newspapers say," exclaimed the archbishop in my ear, "if they knew his name is—Kaiser!"

The final portrait of the twelve pilloried in "Painted Windows" may or may not be the typical churchman referred to immediately in the author's conclusion. Of course Randall Davidson is an archbishop and not a curate, which removes the curse, but a typical churchman he is, and it is the type against which the Gentleman is so impotently waving his duster:

Something is wrong with the church. It is impious to think that heaven interposed in the affairs of humanity to produce that ridiculous mouse, the modern curate. No teacher in the history of the world ever occupied a lower place in the respect of men. So deep is the pit into which the modern minister has fallen that no one attempts to get him out. He is abandoned by the world. He figures with the starving children of Russia in appeals to the charitable an object of pity. The hungry sheep look up and are not fed, but the shepherd also looks up from his pit of poverty and neglect, as hungry as the sheep, hungry for the bare necessities of animal life.

Our author has dealt with twelve very different types of latter-day saint, of which we have given four representative specimens. He then comes to the conclusion that something is wrong with the church, which probably any of the twelve would have freely told him. Certainly none of the dozen would agree with the following:

Science is the one voice that condemns in these days the self-destroying madness of a world set on seeking to live habitually in the lower life. Sometimes journalism may light a candle of reason in our darkness, as when the Times recently pointed out in a leading article that the half-humorous interest of the world in the murderer Landru had its rise in a profound instinct of the human spirit, namely, that horror must be laughed at if it is not to be feared—to fear it is to be overwhelmed by it. This instinct is "an unconscious refusal to believe in the ultimate reality of evil; it is the predecessor of the scientific spirit which says that evil is something to be overcome by understanding it."

There are those who would say that science had created the self-destroying madness seeking to live habitually in the lower life. That may be a sophistic quibble. However, it is science that has made possible our luxury-loving life, and if it can now produce the antidote, it is no more than it should do. Why blame the church?

development with respect to the bond market, says J. G. Donley, Jr., in Forbes Magazine. Some observers have been inspired to greater bullishness on speculative stocks because of the greater volume of loanable funds available at lower rates, while others fear that the pronounced ease in money is a reflection of retarded business recovery and a forerunner of a disappointingly light spring trade.

There is much to be said on both sides. But, looking back over past records of money rate movements, it is found that call money is likely to be in freest supply in the months of February to August, inclusive, in the normal year. The present ease, therefore, may be regarded as a normal movement, heightened perhaps by the very leisurely pace of the business recovery, and accentuated also by the heavy liquidation of bank loans in the West and South which has followed the recovery in prices of farm products.

Now that trade recovery, as slow as it is, has definitely begun, it seems most logical to regard the increasing supply of loanable funds as a bullish factor, because under our system of stock trading, carried on to a large extent on borrowed funds, the interior foundation of any broad speculation must rest upon a complaisant money market.

The most important recent development of positive constructiveness has been the confident recovery in corn and wheat and sterling exchange, which followed unhesitatingly the disconcertingly wide reaction in those markets. Such a sturdy comeback has brought conviction that price improvement has been genuine and based on something more stable than pyramid speculation. A similar reaction undoubtedly would do the stock market good, for it would serve to bring into line those who have insisted on maintaining a skeptical, waiting attitude.

But, disregarding those who are waiting for a reaction, it can not be denied that participation on the part of the general public has rapidly increased. Already the market has gone through several million-share days, and the breadth of dealings, as measured by the number of issues traded in, has seldom been exceeded. Caution is probably still the best policy with regard to speculative issues which have had unduly large advances since last September; but there are a number of stocks which have lagged behind and which may be expected to be brought up into line, even if other parts of the market should suffer a relapse.

Pacific Gas and Electric is particularly attractive as one of the good gas stocks which is out of line. Other gas and utility stocks, such as Columbia Gas and Electric, Consolidated Gas, and People's Gas, have advanced twenty points or so on the average, while Pacific Gas and Electric has so far scarcely moved. Earnings are good, the 5 per cent. dividend is safe, and the yield of 7.5 per cent. has recently attracted confident buying. Another stock that is out of line is California Packing, which yields nearly 8 per cent. at current prices. This company handles a stable line of canned goods and in the past year it has worked out of a difficult inventory position and succeeded in selling its new pack at a profit. Over the longer future the outlook is for gradually increasing earnings.

Another guide to profitable speculation is to be found in the balance sheets now being published. In many cases balance sheets have pointed to pronounced improvement in the financial condition of concerns making a very poor showing in their income accounts for 1921. For instance, United Drug reported a deficit of over $3,500,000 after dividends, but its balance sheet showed an increase of more than $11,000,000 in net working capital. American Can, with small net earnings for its common stock, revealed such a strong financial position in its balance sheet that the stock has already advanced several points and looks for a considerable further advance. Loft, Inc., not only showed good earnings in a bad year, but its balance sheet reflects a decidedly strong financial position. Of course, there are poor balance sheets as well as good. One of the bad examples was that of Pierce Arrow, which shows an acute need for new financing. But, taken all in all, balance sheets have been much better than Wall Street expected, and the reason very likely is that inventories, even though reduced at a loss which was reflected in the income account, have been partly turned into cash, permitting the reduction of bank debts, and the setting up of a stronger position as to liquid assets.

Sears Roebuck has made a good response to the improvement in prices of products of the farm, but this stock has only started on its recovery. It should be bought outright and held for a very substantial rise within the next year or two.

With time money ruling at the lowest rates in a long while, the bull pools have had it pretty much their own way in the market of late, and have made exceptional headway in many specialties which had more or less been ignored in the advance in the leading stocks which took place earlier in the year. Incidentally most of these leading stocks have done very little beyond what they had done last month, which would seem to indicate that there may have been a good deal of quiet selling in such securities under cover of strength in the specialties.

At the same time we have a market in which it seems easier to make money on the buying side than on the selling side, and this has a natural tendency to increase the appetite of buyers. Certainly we may expect that the market may come to an overbought position and our so long overdue reaction will then take place.

There is a good deal of merger talk in Wall Street these days. The Interstate Commerce Commission has opened the way for many mergers in our railroad world. New York Central has been exceedingly strong of late on account of such talk, and certainly the tape action suggests that splendid buying has been going on in that issue as well as in stocks of subsidiary companies helped by the hope that some favorable offer will be made for the minority stockholdings. Quite naturally suggestions of this sort and the recent acquisition by the Nickelplate interests of the Toledo, St. Louis & Western Railroad furnish arguments which pools may use to advantage in connection with various minor rails.

Standard railroad stocks like New York Central, Southern Pacific, Norfolk & Western, and Atchafalpa appeal with particular force to those far-sighted investors who expect rather long-continued ease in the money market and can see a splendid profit in carrying such stocks on account of their dividends, to say nothing of the prospect of a big rise in their market valuations later on.

In the steel trade there is continued talk of a merger of independent interests, and some of the steel stocks have gone higher than they have been for a year or two past. Not much money is being made now by any of them, and probably not a few of them are actually operating at a loss, whereas there is also continued talk of possibility of foreign competition cutting in on domestic steel business at coast points. At the same time there is no captain of industry more certain of prosperity ahead than the managers of our steel plants, who have done such remarkable things in the development of this business in the United States, and when railroad rates and wages are properly adjusted we may look forward to a real boom in steel.—The Trader.

Few people seem to realize the amount of expansion in our transportation machine necessary to keep pace with the growth of the country, said Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, before the Interstate Commerce Commission. And an equal few seem to have any notion of the price we pay for not having it.

Our country is more dependent upon railway transport than any other. All others have comparatively greater coast lines and internal waterways.

The experience of the twenty years before the war has shown that we must build an extension of lines, including terminal facilities, additional sidings, etc., every year equal to the construction of a new railway from New York to San Francisco.

We must add at least 120,000 cars and 2500 locomotives annually to our equipment. Since we entered the war in 1917 we have constructed at least 10,000 miles of railways less than our increasing population and economic development called for and we are behind in rolling stock by about 4000 locomotives and 200,000 cars.

I wish to emphasize that unless we can have an immediate resumption of construction and equipment, our commercial community will pay treble the cost of the whole of them in their losses of a single season.

The very moment that we reach anything like normal business we shall see a repetition of car shortages, followed by an increase in the cost of coal to the consumer from one to three dollars a ton.

We shall again see premiums of 20 cents a bushel for the use of cars for moving grain.

We shall, in fact, see a shortage of commodities to the consumer; and we shall see gluts upon the hands of the producers.

We shall see factories filled with orders again closed for lack of cars; we shall see large intermittency in employment; and we shall see the usual profiteering in commodities due to a stricture between the producer and consumer.

There would be no difficulty whatever, by basing such losses on the experiences we have already had, to calculate a loss to the American people of a billion dollars for each one of these periodic transportation shortages.

It was a big broad stock market the entire month of March, with prices advancing to new high levels, and total sales at times above the million mark. All bear news was ignored, and the much-talked-of reaction failed to materialize, but on the contrary there have been further exhibitions of underlying strength, say E. F. Hutton & Co. in their April monthly review. Public interest is gradually increasing, although the theory of professionals is that it will require something of a setback in values to establish a new buying basis attractive to the public. The assumption is that the advance thus far has discounted the recovery in business, but the fact that the market does not react is suggestive that business is more substantial than at first anticipated. Looking over the general situation, there would seem to be more basis for this belief than has hitherto appeared on the surface. What has appeared to be merely seasonal activity now has a more permanent look, and the treasury officials at Washington, as a result of the reports received through financial centres all over the country, confirm this belief.

The most conservative barometer is the steel industry, which has been showing slow but steady improvement, together with a tendency in the direction of the stabilization of prices. The Steel Corporation is now operating at about 70 per cent. of its capacity, and it is predicted that before the summer ends, it will be up to 80 per cent. The independent companies generally exceed 50 per cent., and some of them are running up to 60 per cent.

Statements of earnings for the month of February, recently issued by several important railroads, including the Baltimore & Ohio, New York Central, Pennsylvania, and Illinois Central systems, show a handsome increase in net earnings that is very gratifying to their stockholders and encouraging to prospective buyers. Sentiment in favor of higher prices for railroad securities continues to grow as it becomes evident that the business of the transportation companies is steadily increasing and that the properties are being operated with the strictest economy.

Imports of refined petroleum into Great Britain recorded in the aggregate an increase in volume in 1921, but a fall in value, say Henry L. Doherty & Co. Against 486,998,063 gallons, valued at £10,482,060, in 1913, and 875,199,000 gallons, valued at £66,317,760, in 1920, imports in the last year rose to 1,061,456,989 gallons, valued at £52,817,217. The average import price was just under one shilling per gallon, compared with one shilling six pence in 1920 and with a fraction over five pence per gallon in the pre-war year. The only item in which decreases in volume occurred in 1921 as compared with the previous year were lamp oil and lubricating oil.

Although the quantity of the refined petroleum oils imported in 1921 greatly exceeded that of 1920, there was a marked decrease in the total value, owing to the decline in prices. In spite of this decline, however, the 1921 prices are still greatly in excess of those of 1913.

The aggregate reexports of petroleum from the United Kingdom, which totaled 4,126,381 gallons valued at £144,311 in 1913 and had risen in 1920 to 53,717,198 gallons valued at £5,387,367, fell to the comparatively low figure of 18,572,697 gallons valued at £1,483,194 in 1921. Lamp oil reexports were about one-sixth, motor spirit and lubricating oil each about one-half, gas oil about one-eighth, and fuel oil approximately one-thirteenth of the 1920 quantities. The total value of the reexports of refined petroleum from the United Kingdom in 1921, although less than one-third of that of the preceding year, was ten times that of the pre-war year, 1913. Also the average prices per gallon, which showed marked decreases as compared with 1920, are still greatly in excess of those of 1913.

The increase of 186,257,989 gallons in aggregate imports and the decrease of 35,144,501 gallons in reexports indicates a stock of over 200,000,000 gallons in 1921 available for consumption compared with 1920.

The exports of refined petroleum, principally lubricating oil, from the United Kingdom totaled 9,156,451 gallons, valued at £1,273,147 during 1921, as compared with 10,391,258 gallons valued at £1,981,446 in 1920.

The Southern Pacific Company has asked for bids on the construction of 2000 single-sheathed, steel superstructure, automobile cars of fifty tons capacity to be used on its Pacific system, according to an announcement by George McCormick, general superintendent of motive power for the railroad.

These cars, which will be the most modern type of automobile cars, will be equipped with double-swing end doors and staggered side doors having ten feet clear opening.

According to McCormick, the Southern Pacific now has 2107 automobile cars in use on its Pacific system and the new order will be the largest ever placed by a Western railroad for this class of equipment.

It is easy to buy bonds

WHAT IS THE AVERAGE BOND SALE?

A few years ago bond buying was considered the privilege of the wealthy. The small investor was compelled to speculate or be content with savings bank interest. Then the average bond sale was $25,000.

Today—due to the fact that we give the same encouragement and service to the small investor that the large investor formerly received, our average sale to individuals, as taken from our sales records, is $2,120.

The average sale to individuals and banks combined, is $4,191.

Thirty-five per cent. of our sales to individuals are $1,000; ten per cent. are $500 and one per cent. $100 bonds.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

The recent publication of Lord Bryce's "International Relations" is of topical interest sandwiched in, as it is, between two great international conferences. This volume—which is published by the Macmillan Company, which is also the publisher of "The Study of American History" and of the celebrated work on modern democracies—embodies a series of eight lectures delivered in the United States in August of last year. James Bryce's interest in Anglo-American amicable relations is synonymous with his name, and among his many activities to promote good international fellowship was his connection with the Institute of Politics of Williams College, under whose auspices these lectures were delivered. The book purports to be mainly non-professional. The author did not "attempt to deal with the more intricate branches of the large subject covered by the term International Relations." The non-professional character of these eight papers on the history, the present, and the problematical future of international politics lies, however, solely in their merit of intelligibility. It is a veritable outline of international politics, and like Wells' famous outline seeks its roots in the beginnings of things. But in its merit of being alike intelligible to diplomatist and layman its unprofessional nature ceases. For the rest, the late Conference at Washington might have done worse than study the new outline and we recommend it as a text for Genoa and afterwards. Lord Bryce's theme is that the study of history, with its accompaniments of perspective and breadth of outlook, is the only hope for a solution to the muddled relations existing between states and the revolutionary conditions within. "International Relations" should be read by every one who is capable of forming an intelligent opinion on world politics.

Bryce's second last publication was "The Study of American History," which was his inaugural lecture upon accepting the Sir George Watson Chair of American History, Literature, and Institutions. It is a remarkable fact that until the foundation of this chair there was not anywhere in the British Isles university instruction in American history or institutions. In 1911 the British-American Peace Centenary Committee discovered the deficiency and turned its attention to providing adequate courses of American history in British universities. The foundation of such a chair was placed among the foremost articles of its programme for the celebration of the Centenary of the Treaty of Ghent (1814-1914). However, the world war interrupted that project, even as it had frustrated so many others. Before the war was over the committee had been dissolved, handing over its functions to the Sulgrave Institution and the Anglo-American Society. It was the latter society that did finally found the much-needed chair that Lord Bryce and his colleagues in international friendship hoped so fervently would promote and cement Anglo-American fraternity. The little volume, which is an address, rather than a weighty contribution to historical research, is chiefly interesting in its connection with the new-made British institution of a chair in American history.

Viscount Bryce's last visit to this country was in the summer of 1921, when he came to take part in the discussions of the Institute of Politics at Williams College. He was not unnaturally regarded as the dean of the conference out of whose lectures grew "International Relations." Lord Bryce died suddenly, shortly after his return to England, at Sidmouth on January 22, 1922. Thus ended the long life that had begun on the 10th of May, 1838, at Belfast, Ireland. The remarkable career of the man is too well known to need further comment; but some light is thrown on his character and achievements by a study of his forebears. His career then becomes a document in heredity. James Bryce's grandfather was one of the long army of martyrs known as the Covenanters. His mother's ancestors had fought and died for the cause at Bothwell Brig. She brought up her son to her faith and he never deserted it. However, ardent Covenanter and anti-Burgher though he was, James Bryce clashed with the other anti-Burghers and was dismissed from their elect midst. He went to the north of Ireland and settled in Aghadoe, where he lived for more than half a century and died at the age of ninety. But it was a half-century of religious war. James Bryce was again unique among anti-Burghers. He was admonished by the Ulster Synod, accused of schismatical courses, suspended, and driven out. Then followed a hard struggle in an unproductive land, supported only by a few followers as poor as himself. But with the obstinacy and constancy of the Scotch-Irish Ulster Protestant, James Bryce and his little sect won out at last. Neighboring ministers came to fall in line with Bryce, who now occupied a sort of unofficial post of bishop over them. All this was food for the soul, but there was often no bread in the house and the children, including Lord Bryce's father, often went hungry, always went barefoot, and pursued the study of theology and the classics. Their mother, who had been Catherine Annan, taught them Greek. She also did the housework and visited the sick. Such were Lord Bryce's forebears. And their history accounts for such abnormal feats in his career as the writing of the "Holy Roman Empire" at the age of twenty-six and the perhaps even greater achievement of producing "Modern Democracies" at the age of eighty-three.

Notes of Books and Authors.

"The Home Radio: How to Make and Use It" is a timely book which the Harpers announce for early publication. A. Hyatt Verrill is the author of this book, which should serve as a guide to the thousands who are now using wireless telephone receiving sets. The author has avoided all technical terms and dissertations, and has aimed to make his directions and explanations plain and simple, illustrated by purely diagrammatic figures. It is intended for those who wish to know how to make, use, or adjust home radios.

Howard Pyle's "Men of Iron" is to be translated into Braille, the alphabet of the blind. It is an interesting fact that Howard Pyle's art training was received exclusively in America.

Mr. Oscar Beringer, the well-known composer, who died recently, was a great friend of Dickens. He composed an opera for which Dickens wrote the libretto that was performed privately years ago, but was never made public.

Miss Rose Macaulay's novel, "Dangerous Ages," has won the Femina-Vie Heureuse Prize awarded by a committee sitting in Paris to an English work of imagination published between June 30, 1920, and June 29, 1921.

James Branch Cabell's "Gallantry" in a new and revised edition is on the McBride spring list. "Gallantry" (Dizain des Fêtes Gallantes) is composed of ten eighteenth-century scenes laid partly in George II's England, partly in France of the time of Louis Quinze.

Francis Hackett's "The Story of the Irish Nation" is to be published this month, according to an announcement by the Century Company. It is a story from the oldest times to the establishment of the autonomous state. Mr. Hackett is the literary editor of the New Republic.

Robinson Crusoe's Island is said to be populated by three hundred families, who support themselves by fishing. The island, a few hundred miles off the coast of Chile, is the island of Juan Fernandez, and it was there that Alexander Selkirk was monarch of all he surveyed for fourteen years.

Ralph Mayhew, "the Bubble Book Man," and David Cory, creator of the Puss in Boots, Jr. Series, address their countless children readers through a new medium now—the home radiophone. Mr. Mayhew talks to his juvenile audience every Sunday evening from 6:30 to 7 from the Newark station, WJZ; Mr. Cory, every Thursday from the Newark station at 6:45. Both supply good-night stories for kiddies within the belt of Eastern time.

On Thomas Seltzer's spring list are D. H. Lawrence's "Aaron Rod"; "Intrusion," a novel, by Beatrice Kean Seymour; Hamilton Fyfe's "The Widow's Cruise," a humorous and

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Elinor Colhouse.

"Elinor Colhouse" is not, properly speaking, a novel at all. It is an episode in a novel. However, its author, while admitting that it is one of five parts of a long work, thinks that it can stand alone. It could in the manner of the average long short story, read in a magazine, if its grip on one were no more felt than is the average magazine story. The truth is that Mr. Hudson's peculiar gifts for realism are so effective that one does not think of the book as a factitious work of art—which it undoubtedly is—but rather as an actual case. It is one of the few, very few, books that leave you with defined curiosity as to its outcome.

Since one has already been invited to consider every possible combination of human affairs that can be compassed in several hundred pages and dubbed a work of fiction, it is hard at first even to understand the effect of "Elinor Colhouse." It is not the charm exerted by so many novels of fascinating or lovable characters. One is no more acquainted and scarcely more attracted by Richard Kurt, hero, than one is by the average man whose domestic or business fiascos hail him with a flare of newspaper publicity. His is an attenuated personality and a conventional type. Still, with Elinor, we scarcely are acquainted with him. Elinor herself is both a type and an individual, and far from an admirable one. She is the typical spoiled American beauty who never had much character and will have less in proportion to her future spoiling. She has scarcely a redeeming trait and her domestic unloveliness is revealed with the impersonal air of a dictaphone in a trial scene. And yet we are qui vive to know what becomes of her and what becomes of her nice but not particularly noteworthy husband, just as we are avid to learn the latest installment of a dramatic follow-up in the morning newspaper.

Mr. Hudson, consciously or unconsciously, has taken a leaf from the human-interest type of journalism, and we suspect that the effect is accidental. He is obviously a writer who is intensely interested in actualities. He has a keen sense of the dramatic—rather unrelieved by humor—but he never lets it run away with him. His drama never becomes theatrical; it has the more effective face of plausibility. In other words, his dénouement is the inevitable result of his given facts, and one follows them with such keen interest just because they ring familiar changes.

"Elinor Colhouse" is a remarkable book. One is tired of bandying the word verisimilitude, and yet it applies with perfect aptness to this chapter of average human nature. Its publisher says that it is a novel women will talk about. We disagree. It is a novel that women will intensely dislike, because it is not flattering. Incidentally, one would think it the work of a clever woman novelist—so shadowy is Richard, so adroitly are Elinor's manoeuvres presented—but we are given to understand that the author is Mr. Hudson. We rather think it is a woman at that, if for no other reason than that Mr. Knopf's usual tabloid authorial biography is missing from the first flap.

ELINOR COLHOUSE. By Stephen Hudson. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; $1.50.

The Training of a Secretary

For those engaged in secretarial work or for those who contemplate taking it up as a profession this book should prove of practical value, as it is the result of long practical experience. The possibilities in the field for persons of energy and initiative are demonstrated and the reader is introduced to the technique of secretaryship by easy stages. Powers, by-laws, the taking of minutes, forms, mechanical helps, the work of private, social, and other secretaries, and financial compensation have all been dealt with adequately. An interesting feature is the general historical aspect of the profession, together with an account of famous secretaries and their careers.

London to Melbourne by Air.

"14,000 Miles Through the Air" is the story of the first flight made by aeroplane from England to Australia. Sir Ross Smith, following his war service as a British airman, undertook to return to his native Melbourne from London via the air. His record of his daring and successful voyage is told in clear, untechnical English, and the narrative is more packed with thrilling adventure than most adventure stories.

The world is treated to what has been called "another attempt to lift the obscurity that hangs over Shakespeare"—although if Shakespeare was obscure one wonders what fame might be. This effort is by two young dramatists, H. F. Rubinstein and Clifford Bax, and the Liverpool Post thus compares their work with the best-known previous attempts: "Frank Harris created a figure in a tragic mask, bitter, pitiable, wretched. Shaw, missing the superb Shakespearean irony and gayety in his portrait, gave us a roistering jester 'Very like myself.' Harris found that Shakespeare's passion for the Dark Lady cankered and took on proud flesh in him, and tortured him to nervous breakdown and madness. Shaw showed us a man with a faculty for laughing at everybody, including himself, and a journalistic passion for noting down fine phrases. The one was impressive, the other amusing, but neither told the whole truth. Messrs. Rubinstein and Bax have made a more comprehensive study, and the result is a play which must stand as the most convincing statement of the Shakespearean enigma until it is supplanted by a better."

Archibald Marshall is working on his new novel, "The Rectory Family," which will be a continuation of his Clinton Series, and will be published in the fall by Dodd, Mead & Co.

GRAND OPERA.

Singers can do wonders in conquering illness and singing above a cold. By the time this column is printed the public will know whether Mary Garden is able partly to fulfill her engagement. The necessary postponement of her performance did away with the possibility of reviewing her work for this week's issue. Rosa Raisa has proved a prop and a stay to the operatic organization during the necessary substitutions. Her powerful, dramatic soprano has responded ably to the extra demands made upon it, the singer herself evidently possessing a large stock of vitality.

She sang Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights of last week in succession, the extra call upon her vocal powers not being noticeable in its effect until Saturday night, when her voice seemed somewhat lessened in volume.

To add to this lady's other vocal feats she gave a short outdoor day concert in front of the Chronicle Building early last week. Also, she unexpectedly was obliged to assume the taxing rôle of Elsa in "Lohengrin"—the substitute bill for Friday night—and on the previous evening, when an exceptionally large audience turned out for "Tanhäuser," she won many plaudits for her singing in the rôle of Elizabeth.

Altogether, Raisa will have put in rather a strenuous two weeks when the season is over. For these singing birds are not wont to overtax their powers by frequent performances, once they have arrived. Muratore, for instance, the star tenor of the troupe, was billed for only three performances. Raisa was the principal figure not only in the three operas mentioned, but in "Aida" as well.

The star cast for Saturday, however, was at the matinee, when Muratore, Edith Mason, and Hector Dufranne sang, Muratore's appearance, with Polacco as conductor, lending to the matinee bill even greater importance.

However, the choicer sections in the vast auditorium were well filled on Saturday night, the presence of some thousands showing that "The Jewels of the Madonna" is a popular opera. The beauty of the music, which has that popular quality of making itself immediately appreciated on a first hearing, is more particularly responsible, but the piece is a modern music-drama, or melodrama, and we naturally appreciate what belongs to our time.

Then there are the two beautiful intermezzos, and the eloquence with which the orchestration interprets the changing moods of the emotional Neapolitans, who come and go during the three acts like a human incarnation of the joy of excitement.

In the midst of all this first act stir, and rush, and vivacity, Raisa's presentation of Maliella retained its arresting quality. The singer emphasized the gipsy qualities of Carmela's wild-hearted adopted daughter, and her close-reefed black hair framing features suited to the rôle lent vraisemblance to the character.

The volatile street groups, frivolous, amorous, and gay, made a strikingly effective contrast to the religious cortège which accompanied the statue of the Virgin, whose jeweled ugliness supplied the suggestion which results in the principal motive of the drama.

The missing quality in the opera is the element of sympathy. These boo-hooing Latins weeping freely on mamma's bosom do not particularly appeal to our feelings, although no doubt in southern Europe they represent reality of type. In Maliella we sense something dangerous; a wild, lawless nature not made for domestic preoccupations, as shown by the impetuosity with which Maliella turned her back on the urge and beckoning of seductive life in a moment of frenzied emotion.

Forrest Lamont and Giacomo Rimini were the two prominent male figures on Saturday night, the tenor showing at the beginning a slight tendency to shear away from the pitch. But this weakness he conquered eventually, giving also a very effectual representation of Gennaro's sufferings.

Giacoma Rimini was, dramatically, a figure to match Raisa's Maliella. They formed a couple strikingly real in the artificial surroundings of opera, the big, athletic baritone putting into the Camorrist leader's love-making a most appropriate suggestion of recklessness and conscienceless.

Giacoma Rimini's great, athletic body fittingly houses a full-bodied baritone, but, oddly enough, it doesn't flow out with sufficient freedom, and is disfigured by a chronic vibrato. There is, in fact, opportunity for this singer to improve his naturally fine vocal equipment by further study; particularly as he has an excellent stage presence, a dramatic temperament, and great intelligence in exercising it.

Maria Claessens, Margery Maxwell, Irene Pavloska, and a long list of lesser singers rounded out a cast that gave us San Franciscans our first real acquaintance with the full dramatic and musical possibilities of the opera; the orchestration, as rendered under Pietro Cimmini's baton, playing an almost equally prominent part with the vocalism, the stream of vivid, eloquent, changeable music flowing like a great, multi-colored tide, illuminating the dramatic action, to whose emotional tempests it forms a background of harmonious loveliness.

The opera, as is the case with every one heretofore presented during the present season, was mounted with excellent realistic and dramatic effect. The setting in the middle act was almost too impressive. It showed what looked like the lofty and imposing façade of an old stone church, whereas it was only the exterior of a Neapolitan tenement house. But the picture it presented was, architecturally, a fine composition, and lent dramatic dignity to the wild, rather sinister love of Maliella for Raffaele.

Lovers of music who are solicitous for San Francisco to hold her own as a music centre, or, at least, as a centre of confirmed appreciation of music, have been exhorting San Franciscans to buck up, even if Mary Garden may not soon recover; her appearance being still uncertain at this writing (Tuesday), in spite of confident assurances on the invalid's part that she will be Johnny on the spot on Wednesday night.

But the second week—with "Madam Butterfly" billed—began auspiciously with a good-sized audience, larger, I should judge, than those of either of the Saturday audiences.

The public, by the way, never heeds exhortations or admonitions about patronizing high-class attractions because it ought to. Like the wind, it bloweth where it listeth, and it blew into the Auditorium by the thousand on Monday night, simply because it loves the opera "Madam Butterfly."

All of the choicer sections of the house, as on Saturday night, were well filled, but the people also spilled over into the contiguous and less desirable territory, and they were there in sufficient numbers to supply that sense of exhilaration which comes when one is a unit in a vast and keenly expectant throng.

Assured as we were in advance of a fine performance, the off-stage aria of Cho-Cho-San made us realize the beauty, purity, and strict adherence to pitch of Edith Mason's soprano. So it remained throughout the opera; a vocal organ of real loveliness, always colored by the tints and shades of Cho-Cho-San's tenderly varied emotions.

If Edith Mason's physical representation could have matched her vocal and dramatic equipment she would have been ideal for the part. But when the child-bride became a suffering woman the actress and the singer were fused into one, and the impersonation was deeply moving.

The invaluable tenor, Edward Johnson, sang the rôle of Pinkerton with great lyric charm, and acted with romantic fervor. Georges Baklanoff succeeded in giving a remarkably strong effect of Sharpless' fundamental disapproval of the Japanese union, even while maintaining a sort of majestic immobility; and the big Russian's beautiful voice flows from his noble sounding-board of a chest like a broad, smooth river of tone.

Irene Pavloska's fine, suave, dramatic contralto, and the fervor with which the singer expressed the poignancy or Suzuki's sympathy were instrumental in heightening the pathos of the general representation, although it seemed to me that the character came a little out of the self-effacement generally characteristic of the rôle; such, for instance, as was practiced on this same stage by Alice Gentle in this rôle six months ago.

A very good bit of acting was done by Octave Dua in the rôle of the rapacious and servile marriage-broker, although the astounding make-up was overdone, and looked as if Goro had begun to putrefy.

The other rôles, those of Kate Pinkerton, sung by Philine Falsco, of Constantin Nicolay's Bonze, and José Mojica's Yamadori, were in good hands, each singer contributing to the general effect the intense emotional suggestion which is so marked a character of this opera.

It is strange how Italians took hold of a short story written by an American about a Japanese woman and the curious social conditions of an alien race and gave it such surpassing beauty and pathos that it stands now as one of the great operas. There is no opera of which the story is told so simply and genuinely, and with such an absence of operatic artificiality, as this has been by those master librettists, Illaca and Giacosa; the latter, indeed, standing very high in Italy as a dramatist in his own right. And Puccini surpassed his highest flights in this opera.

Incredibly beautiful are the orchestral harmonies. There is humanness of tone to the marvelous pathos of those passages which mirror the suffering in Cho-Cho-San's gentle soul, as she stands the night through hoping, longing, and, at the last, fearfully questioning; the supernal suffering of the constant woman-soul inflicted by the earthy, faithless male.

Yes, it is true, perhaps, that Cho-Cho-San was more innocent than Japanese girls in her position are wont to be; true, also, that there are many money-loving Madam Chrysanthème's in Japan. But Madam Butterfly stands for the exception: the exquisite, tender nature created to express purity, constancy, and love. And Puccini wove most inspired music, which expressed the fragrance and beauty of the tender, submissive, faithful heart that was dedicated to suffering, and bound to bruise itself against the hard forgetfulness and selfishness of average humanity.

No other opera, as it seems when we pause to recall them one by one, is so rich in æsthetic suggestion as this. Every setting expresses the Japanese delight in flower and foliage forms, and the beauty of growing things. And to this aspect of the opera full justice was done by the management on Monday night, the Orientalism in costume and architecture lending beauty of design, color, and form to the media employed in each set.

Polacco led, and the untiring vigilance which he exercises over every department of his orchestra resulted in an eloquence and beauty of tonal harmonies which we have never heard surpassed; and possibly never heard equaled in this special score.

"THE BOHEMIAN GIRL."

Funny old, rusty, musty, fusty opera! Funny old stilted situations, toploftical dialogue, such as is nowadays used in burlesques of melodrama! "Leave us! I would be alone!" "Start not," says Arline, "I would chaffly (sic) remain." This is Theo Pennington, who squeaks her pretty singing voice up to the top areas of her head when she changes to a speaking voice.

You can't help enjoying the old ballads in "The Bohemian Girl," but you must be an awful dub if you don't chuckle over the situations. "And now, my friends," says the Count, after a brief interval of battle, murder, and sudden death, "we will resume the festivities."

The Count is extremely pious. His myrmidons would pursue the lawless abductor of the little Arline. But no. First they must wait an operatic prayer skywards. So, while the abductor makes tracks up into the mountain fastnesses with the little Arnheim heiress over his shoulder, the genteel Count detains the myrmidons in prayer. Result, Devils-hoof has successfully fished the coop, and the too devout Count is minus an heiress.

And then Papa Arnheim, after a decade or so, is still plunged into unassuaged grief over the loss of his child. He sings "The Heart Bowed Down," and we remember tenderly how, in our teens, we used to feel right down sorry for the nice, aristocratic, lace-ruffled, inconsolable papa-count.

Then in the market-place where the gipsies assemble there is the mark on the arm of the prettiest gipsy, a start, recognition, "My Child!" and forthwith, without any unnecessary fussing over legal proofs, Arline, the gipsy girl, instantly finds that when she dreamt she dwelt in marble halls she dreamt true.

Yes, it is a dear old piece of absurdity, and we enjoy it in a different way from what we did in those happy past days when the Count's weight of woe was so overwhelming that you could almost spoon it up from his marble halls.

The lively young crickets of "The Mikado" are perfectly matter of fact under these different circumstances. The dialogue comes out like the words of a mechanical doll, but they sing for all they are worth. They don't know much about shading, bless their hearts, but to them so far there is not much shading in life anyway. The clear, ringing notes fairly jump out of their lusty young throats. They—the chorus, particularly—make ecstatic forward movements full of the joy of life as they sing. Lucky kidlets! How they do love their job!

Ed Andrews' comedy training lies in abeyance this week, lost in the folds of Devilshoof's gipsy draperies. For Devilshoof, like the gipsy queen, belongs to melodrama, and fun hasn't much chance in the melodramatic sentimentalities of the one Balfie opera that the public ever knew.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

Saint-Saëns.

Somebody has called Mr. Arnold Bennett the Gordon Selfridge of letters, but with much more point could Saint-Saëns be called the Gordon Selfridge of music, writes N. C. in the Manchester Guardian. He was a sort of universal provider of composition. Whatever your musical want Saint-Saëns could "reach you down" a fair idea of it—symphony, ballet, piano concerto, opera, Messe Solennelle, march for military band, symphonic poem, or fantasia for harp. If versatility were genius Saint-Saëns would be second to none among the composers of all time. But though, as Gounod said, Saint-Saëns could write at will a work in the style of Rossini, of Verdi, of Schumann, or of Wagner, he had no style of his own. You can find every composer known to music in Saint-Saëns—save Saint-Saëns. The real creative genius can not so easily conceal his personality as Saint-Saëns could; let him put his content—or, to use the current coin of the aestheticians, his "intuition"—into as many forms as may be, there yet will emerge from his art some touch that betrays the man. Even the most universal of all artists was always Shakespearean. Hamlet speaks with Othello's accent. The very sculions in the "Comédie Humaine" have genius—the genius of Balzac. The style is the man.

Saint-Saëns himself was a very shrewd critic, and he had no illusions. He was the man of the world all over, with a charming dash of cynicism in his wit. Though he trafficked with the most ambitious forms of music he never inflated himself absurdly in an attempt to fill them. Unlike one or two of the dons circulating in British music of the 'nineties, who had a semblance of Saint-Saëns' technical alacrity, but none of his common sense, Saint-Saëns did not ape the manners of the masters out of snobishness or vanity. He worked at the big forms as he worked at the small forms, because he was in love with his beautiful technique, and, like an artist, never tired of watching the dextrous play of it here, there, and everywhere. He always kept within his limitations, and hardly ever got ponderous. He wrote intriguing essays in composition rather than composition itself. It is not hard to imagine a gentle smile of irony from him on reading in Mr. Hervey's biography this sentence: "How, indeed, can one hope to convey an idea of a musical personality so consistent yet so wayward, so classical yet so romantic, so grave yet so gay? How describe this protean composer who finds himself equally at home whether writing an opera, a string quartet, a symphony, or a simple song?" "I am an eclectic," Saint-Saëns once said of himself, and that was the right thing to say of a man who was very good at saying the right thing.

The last slave in the State of New York, a negress named Margaret Pine, died in 1857.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

The third and final week of the Dunbar comic opera season at the Columbia Theatre will open this Sunday night with a revival of Gilbert and Sullivan's two-act comic opera, "H. M. S. Pinafore," one of the most popular light operas ever staged. Ralph Rackstraw will be sung by Harry Pfeil, and Dick Dead-eye by Ray Goerler. Theo Pennington will be the Josephine, and she is expected to make an even bigger hit than she did in the "Robin Hood" production. Little Buttercup will be sung by Paula Ayres, and Ed Andrews is entrusted with the rôle of Sir Joseph Porter. K. C. B., while Captain Corcoran will be played by Carl Bunsch. George Olsen as Bill Bobstay and Regina Manville as Hebe will complete the cast. Song gems of great popularity are included in this work. Among them are "We Sail the Ocean Blue," "I'm Called Little Buttercup," "The Merry Maiden and the Tar," "Farewell, My Own."

Easter Monday night, April 17th, marks the opening of Chauncey Olcott's annual engagement at the Columbia. The vehicle that he has chosen for his San Francisco offering is "Ragged Robin," by Rida Johnson Young and Rita Olcott. A Broadway cast headed by Ethel Intropidi will assist. Already the gallery gods are getting ready to whistle Olcott's new song hits.

The Orpheum Next Week.

William Seabury's latest divertissement is an assortment of pleasing songs and dances. Assisting him are Rose Stone, Edith May Capes, Marie Cavanaugh, Margaret Quimby, J. Roney Clements, and Bud L. Cooper. This is said to be the ultimate in intimate little revues.

Both Clarence Oliver and Georgie Olp have been legitimate players for years. They ventured into the two-a-day with a sketch by Agnes Scott called "The Wall Between" and followed this with a one-act play by Hugh Herbert called "Discontent." Their new playlet is called "Wire Collect," and was written by William Anthony McGuire. Mr. McGuire has written several distinctive sketches, and the biggest of the season's Broadway hits was from his pen—"Six-Cylinder Love."

Who else but a Scot could be named Sandy Shaw? And where else could we find that same delightful burr-burr which Sandy Shaw uses so pleasantly, except in Scotchmen? There are few Scots like Sandy. He has a highly developed sense of humor and a happy knack of singing songs so that their memory lingers.

A Creditable Production

"The Sorcerer" at the Players Club Friday and Saturday nights during April and May is attracting attention for the way it has been staged and costumed. Scenery and costumes are unusual. The dances put on by Katharine Edson are also interesting features. A good cast of principals and a chorus of forty make this production one of the best things the Players Club has done.

Kreisler's Offering

Here is the programme which A. R. Kreisler will give in San Francisco at the Exposition Auditorium on Easter Sunday and at the Municipal Auditorium in Fresno on Monday night, April 17th:

Kreutzer Sonata ..... Beethoven
Allegro sostenuto—Presto.
Andante con variazioni Presto.
Concerto in E minor ..... Mendelssohn
Allegro molto appassionato—Andante.
Allegretto non troppo.
Allegro molto vivace.
Hymn to the Sun ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Ballet Music from "Rosemunde" ..... Schubert
Lot's Land ..... Cyril Scott
La Gitana, Caprice Viennois ..... Kreisler

The three men in the musical world who draw the largest audiences at present are John McCormack, tenor; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; and Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist. McCormack, Kreisler, and Rachmaninoff always give what they themselves like best, and this makes their triumph the greater; they raise the public to their level and the genius which warms their hearts kindles enthusiasm even in those who do not ordinarily care for music. There are more men at their recitals than at any other similar musical entertainments.

Kreisler, who made a modest beginning in San Francisco some fifteen years ago, will give his only San Francisco recital on Easter Sunday, April 16th, at the Exposition Auditorium. This recital, under the local management of Frank W. Healy, already has such a large advance sale as to indicate that every seat in the great hall will be filled when Mr. Kreisler appears.

Polo at Del Monte.

The matches in the Del Monte Polo Tournament will run until April 9th, when the California winter season closes. Mr. and Mrs. J. Howard Schroder, Mrs. David Blankenhorn, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar G. Miller, Miss Louise Burke, Carleton Burke, Arthur Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. L. B. Peoples, Miss Beatrice Peoples, and Mr. and Mrs. Keith Spalding have been among the southerners at the games.

Much concern is felt over the serious accident which Major Robertson sustained in the polo match against Midwick on Sunday. He is suffering from concussion of the brain and other serious injuries, and his condition is reported as critical.

The North vs. South Feature Polo Match will close the Del Monte tournament and the season in California next Sunday. Carleton Burke, the Midwick star, will captain the southern team, and will probably have in the line-up Teddy Miller, Elmer Boeseke, Arthur Perkins, and himself. The north line-up will likely consist of Tom Driscoll, Eric Pedley, Hugh Drury, and Will Tevis, Jr.

Among the polo set from San Mateo and the Peninsula who took in the matches at Del Monte over the week-end were Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence McCreery, Mr. and Mrs. S. F. B. Morse, Miss Katherine Ramsey, Miss Katherine Kuhn, Miss Ysabel Chase, Mr. Richard DeC. Schwerin, Mr. Archibald Johnson, Mr. Harry Hunt, Mr. John Parrott, and Mr. W. W. Crocker.

THE DECAY OF GRAND JURIES.

For several centuries the spirit of comedy has found pasture in grand juries (says the Manchester Guardian). The Brown who boasted that the Browns had been grand jurors ever since the flood was a standing butt of Elizabethan wit. The travelers whom Falstaff robbed at Gadshill pleaded that they were grand jurors, in the spirit of the French lady who, at a still more serious crisis, asked her father confessor if God would not think twice before damning a person of her quality. "Grand jurors, are ye?" Falstaff replied. "Well jure ye, i' faith." Something of this contumacious spirit towards grand juries has betrayed itself since the war, even in grand jurors themselves. Among other war economies, we did without them then, yet justice managed to get itself done. Until that great hazard had been run, it was perhaps a not completely refutable view that the admirable previous results of our trials at Assizes and Quarter Sessions had only been rendered possible by the discretion of grand juries in throwing or refraining from throwing out bills. Until some convulsion even greater than the war prevents all the cocks in the world from crowing, there may linger the simple faith of Chanticleer that the sun gets up because Chanticleer crows.

Indeed, even the simple faith of the Elizabethan grand juror appears even now, after the war, to linger in the bosom of the chairman of the East Riding Quarter Sessions. His defense of the system on Tuesday shows us a soul in which there is no guile. "He liked," he said, "being a grand jurymen because of the position of enormous power that it gave to them. They stood above judges, juries, and even courts of law. They absolutely had plenary power to prevent any man being put on trial." It sounds as if grand jurors must be the Hidden Hand of which some of our sterner patriots used to talk darkly during the war. A grand jury, this champion said, could "go into a room and hold a secret inquiry not bound by any rules of evidence," and if in this secret session they decided to veto a trial, they "gave no reasons and were bound by an oath of secrecy not to reveal anything that happened in their room." Described with this warmth, it seems an almost guilty pleasure. But the speaker justified it on the ground that "in the criminal law of England the scales were not held even; they were always tipped in favor of the accused persons," and the grand jury was just one tip more. Of course we all want to be nice and chivalrous about benefits of doubts and so forth, but still we have to remember that for some years now we have given accused persons a new security in the Court of Criminal Appeal. May we not go just a little too far in the direction of making criminal justice a kind of safety net for fish, warranted not to catch them if it can help it? Court-martial justice in the army sometimes approaches this ideal of inoffensiveness to offenders, because the judges are usually good-natured men, highly conscious of being no judicial experts, and desperately anxious not to convict the innocent, whatever else they may do wrong. Besides, is the grand jury ever really relied upon as a deliverer by innocence falsely accused? Is not its only substantial effect to give a pleasant sense of public function and prestige to a certain number of persons who have not so much else to do as they should, and also to waste the time of a certain number of others who would much rather be elsewhere, doing some work of real use to themselves or the public or both?

The Hudson River was not originally discovered by Henry of that surname, but by Giovanni Verrazani, an Italian sailing on a mission for the King of France. He entered the Narrows in 1524.

Britain lost 700,000 men in the world war.

PORTOLA WOODS

A Spring Valley Subdivision

In the desirable Woodside district of San Mateo County is the country-home acreage known as Portola Woods. It adjoins the Family Farm and the properties of Stanford University, being situated less than five miles from the University buildings.

Here are thickets and open spaces, hills and hollows, with a wealth of oaks, redwoods and other trees, the whole so subdivided as to give each parcel the charm of scenic variety.

Bear Gulch Creek flows through the property to join San Francisquito Creek.

Water is piped to every lot, the roads are good, there are here combined the advantages of rustic seclusion and accessibility.

Home-sites vary in size from 8 to 39 acres. For the parcels that remain unsold prices per acre range from $450 to $650—lower than prevailing prices for similar property in that region. These prices are particularly attractive compared with prices of city lots.

The high-class improvements on the parcels already sold stamp the countryside so unmistakably that this subdivision can not fail to appeal to the most discriminating seeker after the ideal country-home site.

Full information and maps may be had from T. J. Wilder, Real Estate Department, Spring Valley Water Company, 375 Sutter Street, San Francisco. Douglas 2562.

VANITY FAIR.

At Charlotte, Iowa, the worst has happened, the feared has come to pass, the cake is dough, the beans are spilled, the fat is in the fire, the women's strike is now undoubtedly on, and Wednesday night, which is beaux' night in Charlotte just-as Saturday night is bath night, and which was once devoted to the tender sighings and bosom-fluttering boldnesses of the masculine advance, is given over to the dearth and desolation that "dwell in the cold o' the moon." Those feminine candidates for mayor and the city council, Mrs. James McDermott, Mrs. Nick Steiner, and Mrs. Martin Neilson, have been permitted to taste the bitterness of defeat. Jim, Nick, and Martin may welcome back their spouses to the kitchen stove and other domestic amenities, glad to endure long dissertations on how it happened, in return for the reestablishment of their connubial raptures, and careless of the outcast state of their fellow male Charlotteans; but to those whom a cruel ukase has condemned either to eternal celibacy or to exile from their native gumbo soil, the affair is no joke. Red rust roosts upon the wires of the useless mandolin, and nothing comes but silence from the bosom of the light guitar. The sentence imposed in advance by the young women of Charlotte upon the bachelors of their fair city was that if the lady candidates were not elected, the aforesaid bachelors need never again call around. Those candidates were not elected.

Further than that, the news appears to have been suppressed. Unlike the coal strike, the women's strike has had little publicity. Some dark, official censorship, perhaps of the Chamber of Commerce or the Rotary Club exercised through the recently elected masculine mayor, seems to hang over the scene and prevent the light of truth from leaking forth. But as the ukase was imperative and the sentence unconditional, we have no doubt of the sad state of affairs at the focus of trouble. The resolution with which this edict issued left no room for doubt as to the outcome. For Charlotte bachelors, there can be no resource on Wednesday night henceforth but the prayer-meeting or the soft-drink parlor. Well, the prayer-meeting is where they belong. Let them pray, and groan and testify. All is lost, save the Iowa, and Southern California, brand of piety. It serves them right. Vanity Fair warned them to rebel, resist, parade with banners, and adopt other tactics calculated to make the fair sex fair. We have not heard that our advice was heeded. We can do no more for Charlotte. Let the mandolin wires rust, the catgut snap in the night like that of the harp that hung, until recently, on Tara's walls, the race suicide go on. We pass to themes more violent still.

Our slaughterhouses are in peril. The feminist movement threatens to oversweep and engulf them, just when we had begun to cherish some hope of a shrinkage in the price of meat. Dr. Albert Sy of the University of Buffalo, speaking before the delegates of the Erie County Women's Clubs, warns the said delegates and all their sisters that they must mend their ways of taking nutriment. Being duly constructive in his criticism, Dr. Sy tells them how. Says Sy: "Be 100 per cent. cannibal; eat raw meat, drink the blood of the slaughtered animal, and gnaw the bones to the marrow, to attain the highest degree of physical perfection." And what woman (club or domestic) was ever known in the world to whom counsels of physical perfection lacked cogency and compelling force? Dr. Sy's advice goes even farther than that, possesses an added attraction that draws like a poultice on a carbuncle. It promises a new fad. Women have tried so many things of late to increase the interest of life, and to enable them to express themselves and take their proper place of larger usefulness in the world! They have tried cocktails, and cigarettes and creosote-reeking pipes. They have abhorred the pipes and probably the cigarettes, but at least they were something new. They have paraded the streets of our largest cities clad all the way down to the knees in the skins of skunks and jaguars and other wild animals. They have gambled at bridge and stud poker in order to break the chains of the slavery that bound them. They have gone into politics. In that newly-awakened sex-consciousness which was to set them forever free they have read sex novels, and studied Sig Freud's Dream Book, and have followed with eagerness the psychic researches of such profound feminists as W. L. George and David Lawrence and Tex Rickard. It was not much good. At home there always awaited them at the close of club meeting or afternoon parade certain sordid and degrading contacts which chain the soul to earth and frazzle up the tender feathers of the spirit's new-fledged wings; such as cleaning the baby's neck and ears or sewing a patch on the old man's garden pants. From such a prison as repressed womanhood has had to endure, who would not flee to pastures new?

And now comes Dr. Sy, and points out that those pastures are the abattoir. En Avant! Ribs and scapulae, chine and thigh! Away with rolled oats! Away with tea! Blood's the thing! Cracking bones for the raw marrow within is what gave physical perfection to the sabre-toothed tiger, and shall our women hesitate? Never let it be said that they clung to their chains, or hugged the dull conventions of their grandmothers, when the way to glorious self-expression and physical perfection lay before them, and science invited to the feast of horns, hides, and tallow. We may expect our abattoirs to be overrun, and the contents devoured down to the hoofs. Even the horses are no longer safe, and their owners may as well take warning and do what they can to salvage the saddles and the shoes.

The only wonder is that the Buffalo savant's discovery was not sooner made. A wider observation would long ago have shown us what was lacking to physical perfection among women, and thus we might have anticipated his prescription by many generations. For example, the tribes in the vicinity of Lake Tanganyika are devoted to a diet of live lizards. The women are said to be very beautiful; by those Tanganyikan men who admire them. White men do not, but that argues merely narrowness of intellect—the feeble-minded creatures seem to prefer the pale and delicate females with white skins, who live on cooked food. Again, the Eskimo women attained their physical perfection by a diet of raw seal meat, with an occasional candle. Some of them have proved attractive to whalers after the second winter in the Arctic, their charms quite potent when approached from the windward side. Again, the women of Kurdistan, who live on tallow, thereby acquire that "moon-faced" look so much admired by their lords. Their perfection is undeniable. And the Indian women of the plains, who derived a large part of their nutriment from chewing the inside of fresh buffalo hides to make robes were always noted for their pulchritude. So the doctor appears to be on the right track, and we may expect the rush for the slaughterhouses to begin. Of course, when the women have attained physical perfection they will have become more desirable to men, which will mean more of the bondage of home, more little necks and ears to be cleaned. But perhaps some of them are willing to risk even that.

Of great assistance to the development of feminine perfection will be the fixation of the waist line, or equator. At present this matter is enshrouded in mystery, the exact situation of the feminine equator unknown. It appears to be rambling about somewhere between the shoulders and the knees, with some risk that it may slip off altogether. Among the arbiters of fashion there is no consistency of opinion on the subject, and it looks as though a new Congress of Vienna, or of Paris, or of Versailles would be necessary to settle the business; perhaps by decision to be enforced by some new international league or alliance. The great authorities are all at sea just now. Chanel declares the equatorial line of the fashionable woman will be somewhere between the hips and the knees. This is low. Patou says it will be a diagonal, a sort of ecliptic, ascending from a point four inches above the right knee to a point one inch below the left hip. Not so, says Bouillet; it shall be just below the hips, but a trifle higher behind than in front—thus suggesting Harry Léon Wilson's mythical animal, the high-behind. Paul Poirer approaches the normal by declaring that it shall be just above the hips, while Worth dares to be logical by laying down the rule that the waist line should be at the waist. This leaves nothing to settle except the question, where is that?

Compared with the issue of the feminine equator, it looks as though the Genoa Conference would have but simple things to deal with. If it be true that wars are provoked by women, world peace is afar. One shudders to think what might follow a bad decision and the discovery by womankind that her waist line was not where she wished it to be. And there is another dangerous phase of the matter. Nothing has thus far been said about length, upon which, of course, diameter depends.

New Caledonia is afflicted with a strange scourge; it is invaded by stags. These animals are growing so numerous as to constitute a veritable danger. Prices have been offered for killing them, and the New Caledonians, who are too few to strive against them, appeal to the Australians. A very simple means has been suggested to destroy them. It consists in turning tigers loose against them in the New Caledonian jungle. But the inhabitants, after reflection, have preferred to keep the stags.

The Atlantic Ocean was formed by a rift in the land mass caused by the withdrawal of lateral support when the moon was flung out of what is now the Pacific.

Cretan civilization flourished more than four thousand years ago.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

An old lady of seventy, a member of a long-lived family, had been paying a visit to her mother, aged ninety-five. The aged daughter was rather tearful at the parting. "Good-by, dear mother!" she said, "I hope we shall meet again." "I hope so, my child," her mother briskly retorted. "They tell me you are looking very well."

A young married woman who was something of a flirt was in the habit of receiving attentions from her admirers in the absence of her husband. One evening an old flame was calling on her who ventured to become reminiscent. "Ah," he sighed, "if only you had married me instead of George." "Then I should have been with George at this very moment, instead of with you," was the coquettish wife's retort.

A real estate agent was showing a prospective buyer over a large estate in the south of England. He was a youngster who had been through the war and had become Americanized. As the car threaded its way through English lanes he extolled the natural beauties of the place, park, meadows, woods. At last, the car having arrived at a clear space where there were neither trees nor gardens, the enthusiastic agent pointed heavenwards. Waving his arm, he concluded, "And there's a sun for you! Can you beat it?"

Shortly after buying a new car an Irishman had the misfortune to collide with a telegraph pole. The accident was fatal to both car and owner. It devolved upon the late driver's friend Denis to break the news to the widow. "Well," asked a friend, "how did you come out?" "Fine," said Denis. "I began easylike telling her her husband was kilt entirely and horribly mangled, and then I gradually led up to the climax and told her that divvle a stick or a spring was left of the car."

Martha was a pale little wife whose white cheeks indicated her listless condition. Her husband worried about her lack of bloom till Cousin Helen came from the East for a visit. Martha improved wonderfully with bright companionship. Her husband was not slow to express his gratitude to his wife's cousin. "Helen, you can't imagine how much good your visit has done Martha. She looks ten years younger." "Well, I am so glad, Cousin George," Helen babbled. "And if she keeps on using that rouge I'm leaving her she'll always have that healthy complexion, like mine."

Booth Tarkington is said to be an admirer of the gentler qualities of the colored people. The following story at least bears up the assumption. "They are a delightful race," Mr. Tarkington is quoted as saying. "I know a minister who once married a young colored couple. 'How much Ah owes you, rev'und,' the bridegroom asked after the ceremony. 'Oh,' said the minister, 'pay me whatever it is worth to you.' The young darky looked his dusky bride over from head to foot with adoring eyes. Turning to the minister, he said, 'You's ruined me fo' life, rev'und, yo' shoa' has!'"

An old sergeant equally noted for his ability as a drillmaster and for his proficient profanity was always assigned the job of breaking in raw recruits. A captain with advanced ideas took him to task. He succinctly pointed out that the sergeant's duty was to teach the men to drill—not to swear. The sergeant docilely acquiesced, but the following day the captain overheard the reformed sergeant say at drill: "Now I want you to step out lively, my sons. And keep your eyes straight to the front, my sons. And hold your heads up, my sons. You know the kind of sons I mean."

The Whistler Journal quotes Thomas Carlyle's experience when he sat for his portrait to Watts: "There was Mr. Watts, a mon of note. And I went to his studio, and there was much meestification, and screens were drawn around the easel, and curtains were drawn, and I was not allowed to see anything. And then at last the screens were drawn aside, and there I was. And I looked. Mr. Watts, a great mon, he said to me, 'How do you like it?' And I turned to Mr. Watts, and I said: 'Mon, I would have ye know I am in the habit of wurin' clean lunen.'"

A free lance journalist found himself on a train without a ticket and decided to play the deadhead game. When the conductor appeared he told him that he had left his pocket-book at home, but that he was on the staff of the Daily News. "All right," said the official, "come forward to the next car. We've the editor of the Daily News aboard and he can identify you." There was no turning back now, so the passenger followed the conductor, expecting ignominious exposure, but to his great surprise the editor, looking up from his paper, said simply: "Yes, conductor, that's all right. The man is on my staff." When the conductor had departed the free lance undertook to express his gratitude to the great man for his magnanimous falsehood. "Oh, don't mention it," said the other. "You see, I'm not the editor of the Daily News."

A Middle West tourist tells the following story: "I was promenading the deck of a steamer en route to San Francisco from Los Angeles. The ocean was decidedly rough and the boat rolled from side to side. A submarine captain on board told me the boat was top-heavy, and it was loaded light. I was passing the entrance to the bridge when people began pouring from their cabins, buckling on life preservers, faces blanched and terror-stricken. There was a concerted rush to starboard. The boat gave an upward heave, and a woman fainted and fell at my feet. I picked up a life-preserver and, buckling it about her waist, carried her to a railing. A captain in uniform ran shouting into the crowd, but his voice was drowned in the confusion. As I leaped to the rail to dive overboard I glanced over my shoulder. The crowd had paused. Women were chatting comfortably, while the men were calmly enjoying a smoke. A man in puttees, carrying a megaphone, approached me and grinned: 'We are making a moving picture, but we didn't shoot this scene. This was the rehearsal. You got so much pep in it we'll give you a $50 voucher if you'll do it over and make the dive.'"

The ancient Egyptians had incubators in which slaves served as thermometers.

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Family Tree.

My dad was a famous two-gun man,
I'm sure you remember his name:
As Loose-Trigger Pete
He could shoot awful neat
When a piker nosed in on his game.
A rustler he was by perfesbion
Till one of his pals spilled his dope,
An' dad paid his fine
From the branch of a pine
At the end of a hundred-foot rope.
His father before him was clever
In his little amachure way;
Cards was his style,
An' he laid by a pile
As a dealer in ol' Santa Fé.
But he shuffled 'em jes once too often:
They caught him one night with th' goods.
An' although he was hung
We are proud that he swung
From the prettiest pine in the woods.
An' so if I say it as shouldn't
I come from a famous ol' line,
So you'll understand
Why this mornin' I stand
At the foot of a wide-spreadin' pine.
They got me for stoppin' th' mail coach;
Yes, jes' once too often for me.
But dad and his dad
When they see, will be glad
That I swing from the family tree.
—George Mitchell in Judge.

A Superior Messenger.

When Brussels was under the yoke of the invaders a notable Belgian one day went to the convent of the Jesuits and asked secretly if it were not possible to get a letter forwarded to his son, a defender of the Yser.

"That's extremely difficult," they told him. "We are spied upon. The Germans are more vigilant than ever. Still, we'll see."

A few days later the father of the soldier saw a workingman coming to his house.

"I am sent by the Jesuits," he said to him. "I'll try to cross the lines. Give me your letter."

"Here it is. Take this for your trouble, and let's go to the café and drink to the success of your mission."

"With pleasure."

A week later the workingman came again. He brought the soldier's reply. Delighted, the Belgian kissed him, and the two again went to the café to drink, this time to victory. After which the Belgian hastened to the Jesuit Fathers to thank them.

"I'd like to see the superior," he said.

"The superior? Why, he was in your house this morning."

"This morning?"

"Yes, this very morning. He was the workingman who carried your letter to Furness."

A special dispatch to the New York Times tells of a Department of Commerce announcement that to relieve the coin shortage in Colombia the Philadelphia Mint will make $3,000,000 50-centavo pieces from silver furnished by the Equitable Trust Company of New York.

The term Yankee, according to Bombaugh, is not Indian, but Dutch, and means to snarl and quarrel. It was applied by the burghers of New Amsterdam to the invaders from Connecticut.

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Mrs. Sargeant's Paintings.

A retrospective exhibition of paintings by Mrs. Genève Rixford Sargeant opens in the Palace of Fine Arts April 7th. The collection fills one gallery and covers Mrs. Sargeant's development over a period of thirty-four years, ranging from an early landscape study of the sandhills and bay at Land's End painted in 1888 down to a very interesting and colorful portrait of "Ora" painted last year. Between these two dates her art runs the gamut of Whistlerian tonalities and colorful impressionistic renderings of figure, landscape, and flowers. Mrs. Sargeant is one of those painters who has not found it necessary to go far afield for her subject-matter.

She is extremely successful in her portrait characterizations, such as her portrait of the late Mathilde Wismer. Her portraits of "Father and Son," "The Boy with the Boat," and "The Little Mother" each in its way reflects that inner observation which is a true record of personality successfully visualized on canvas. Her portrait of "Margaret," which was awarded the Martin B. Cahn prize by the Art Institute of Chicago as far back as 1903, is a capital bit of painting in the Whistlerian mode, which was then the predominant influence among the younger painters of the day.

By no means one of the most sensational exhibitions held in the Palace of Fine Arts, it will probably be considered one of the most charming. The exhibition will continue for a period of six weeks. The Museum is open to the public free daily from 10 to 5, including Sundays and holidays.

Sperry Flour Awarded International Cup.

The Victory Challenge Cup, annually awarded at the Glasgow Bakers' Exhibition, again has been given to Sperry Flour, according to cable advices just received. It is significant that Sperry Flour was the only flour from the United States used in the bakings. It is doubly significant that this flour received the Victory Challenge Cup last year also. "Thus you see," said one of the officials of the Sperry Flour Company in commenting on the award, "that the fame of Sperry Flour has not alone hurdled state boundary lines, but has spanned the sea itself."

The 150 people of Goust, in the lower Pyrenees, have enjoyed self-determination as an independent republic since the early part of the seventeenth century. Goust is a mile square.

The California Historical Society.

The California Historical Society has again been revived, and the following are the officers and directors: President, Charles Templeton Crocker; first vice-president, H. R. Wagner; second vice-president, E. S. Heller; third vice-president, C. O. G. Miller; secretary and treasurer, T. W. Hubbard; directors—Charles Templeton Crocker, H. R. Wagner, E. S. Heller, C. O. G. Miller, T. W. Hubbard, John S. Drum, E. J. Molera, Alfred Holman, R. E. Cowan, D. Q. Troy, and Walter S. Martin.

This society was incorporated as early as 1852 and was revived in 1886.

An invitation has been extended to all interested in the society to join, and names can be sent to this office or to the office of the secretary in the Phelan Building.

CURRENT VERSE.

My Light with Yours.

When sea has devoured the ships,
And the spires and the towers
Have gone back to the hills,
And all the cities
Are one with the plains again.
And the beauty of bronze
And the strength of steel
Are blown over silent continents,
As the desert sand is blown—
My dust with yours forever.

When folly and wisdom are no more,
And fire is no more,
Because man is no more;
When the dead world slowly spinning
Drifts and falls through the void—
My light with yours
In the Light of Lights forever!

—Edgar Lee Masters.

Nirvana.

Sleep on, I lie at heaven's high oriel,
Over the stars that murmur as they go
Lighting your lattice-window far below.
And every star some of the glory spells
Whereof I know.

I have forgotten you, long, long ago;
Like the sweet, silver singing of thin bells
Vanished, or music fading faint and low.
Sleep on, I lie at heaven's high oriel,
Who loved you so. —John Hall Wheelock.

A New Ballad of Charity.

God knows how time shall use me yet,
For I with brain too wise have known
A world corrupt, nor can forget
Some evil there as still my own—
Poor griefs henceforth may be alone
My calendars to reckon by,
But in my empires overthrown
I'll keep a heart of charity.

Wronged, and wrong doing, still I'll pray
For gentleness to all my kind,
So soon tomorrow strikes today,
And then a day when all is blind,
And the vainglory of the mind
Passes, and all together lie
Where nothing is but hope to find
The excellence of charity.

There is no virtue in us all
But keeps with sin for housefellow,
And, when the blade of death shall fall,
Starveling and naked must we go;
And none of all shall warrant show
To save him from damnation by,
But only this—"Dear God, you owe
All that I dealt of Charity."

And, O you English, let us make
Our hearts a little wise today,
And learn for best religion's sake
To walk awhile the homeward way.
Too long we cast an alien clay
And towards a far and fading sky
Too long a pilgrimage we pay—
For there is not our charity.

Since I am English bred, I'll keep
A year and year my journey still
By little Langdale tarns asleep,
Or, with my rhymes on Bredon Hill,
I will go shepherding until
The shires from Severn down to Wye
Are figured messages to fill
My quietness with charity.

And where the yellowhammer sings
From bramble blooms in Water Lane
I'll make a world of sweeter things
Than are in blind ambition's brain,
And there I will forget the pain
Of envy and the fears defy
That in love's bitterness complain—
Because I walk with charity.

The primroses of Bagley Wood,
Old apple trees at Piddington,
Helvellyn in his cloudy hood—
Shall I not write them, one by one,
The true, the best, occasion
Of all my faith before I die?

For other gossellers are none
To teach me holy charity.
—John Drinkwater in "Seeds of Time."

Modern scholars do not believe the Pyramids were built by any lost art of engineering. Probably it was mere brute strength working on long ramps.

Death of Mrs. R. Gilman Brown

The London Times of February 23d records the death, at Esher Lodge, Esher, England, of Mrs. R. Gilman Brown, for many years a leading figure in women's golf in California and on the Pacific Coast.

As a member of the San Rafael Golf Club and of the San Francisco Golf and Country Club she was between 1897 and 1906 active in all club and inter-club matches. She was the moving force in forming the California Women's Golf Association, and won the first championship played under its auspices.

Her last public success in California was winning the Mrs. William H. Crocker Cup; finally won a second time at Burlingame in 1906 in a hardly contested match.

On her removal to England in 1906-7 she became a member of the Burhill Golf Club, near London; was three times captain of the club, competed in all of the English championships up to the war, and was active in all that could foster the interests of the game.

The State Exhibit of California Wild Flowers opens at the St. Francis Hotel on April 20th and continues for three days. Informal musical programmes have been arranged for both afternoon and evening, and brief addresses by such leading scientists and educators as Benjamin Ide Wheeler, David Starr Jordan, Ray Lyman Wilbur, Dr. Aurelia Henry Reinhardt, and Dr. William Frederic Bate of the Sierra Club. Mr. and Mrs. Luther Burbank will be in attendance. Mrs. Bertha M. Rice, head of the Wild Flower Conservation League, is directing the exhibit, assisted by Mrs. Roxana Ferris of Stanford University, who will assume the responsibility of identifying, with the aid of her advanced students in the botany department, the mammoth collection of wild flowers and native plant life which will be sent in from all sections of the state. This is the eighth annual state exhibit of our wild flowers and native shrubs, the object being to impress the public with the variety, charm, and value of this particular phase of California's outdoor loveliness and to stimulate interest in its protection.

Classic Rome had no street lights.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Tommy—Dad, what's a Scotch mist?
 Father—When a man asks you to have a nip and you don't hear him.—Tit-Bits.

Mrs. Jameson—Do you believe that awful story they tell about her? Mrs. Johnson—Of course I do! What is it?—Stockholm Kasper.

Post—Were you disappointed because you had such a miserable time? Parker—Oh, no! The invitation referred to it as a picnic.—Judge.

"What! You are drinking and belong to a temperance society!" "Yes. But I haven't paid my yearly subscription yet."—Stockholm Strix.

Journalism—In my opinion, no one can be good-looking unless well dressed. Fine Arts—And yet Venus was a success.—Columbia Jester.

Jack—Halloa, Bert, who's the girl? Bert—What d'you mean? Jack—Well, you're not wearing a collar like that for fun, are you?—London Tit-Bits.

Teacher—Willie, what is a cubic yard? Willie—I don't know for sure, but it must be a yard that them Cuban kids play in.—New York American.

Miss Flap—She swears that no young man's lips have ever touched hers. Miss Flip—Well, that's enough to make any girl swear, I think.—New York Sun.

Knicker—What do you think of the modern jokes? Bocher—Oh, they are about the same as the old ones. Knicker—Yes, and a little older, eh?—Stevens Tech. Stone Mill.

"Did you telephone the plumber that the hot-water pipes are leaking?" "Yes, my dear." "What did he say?" "He said he'd put us on his waiting list."—New York Sun.

Wife (awakened)—Why so grumpy, Tom? Didn't your host have a congenial gathering? Tom (sighing)—Yeah; there were several men present with rather winning personalities.—Judge.

Motorist—You say this isn't the road to Mudville? Then that fellow down the line lied to me. Wayfarer—Hee-Hee! How d'ye know he did? Mebbe it's me that's lyin'.—American Legion Weekly.

Mistress—I've lost the key of my writing-desk, Marie. Go and look in the old trunk in the kitchen—you might find an old key that will fit. Marie—It's no use, madame, I tried them all long ago, and none of them fit.—Paris Le Matin.

Colored Rookie—I'd lak to have a new pair o' shoes, suh! Sergeant—Are your shoes worn out? Colored Rookie—Worn out! Man, the bottoms of mah shoes are so thin Ah can step on a dime and tell whether it's heads or tails!—Pitt Panther.

He is a negro boy eleven years of age. He peddles fish from a pushcart in Freeport, Long Island. "What is your name?" asked a kindly woman customer. "Mose, mostly," he replied, "but mah maiden name is Captain."—New York Evening Post.

It was the fag-end of a tedious evening. At the close of the third twenty-minute lapse he said plaintively: "I wish I had money. I'd travel." "Well," she replied, as she began to unroll her stocking, "how much do you need?"—Mass. Tech. Voo Doo.

The preacher was out on the links and thought a small moral lesson might not be amiss. "I notice," he remarked mildly, "that the players who get the lowest scores are not those who swear." "Why the hell should they?" snorted the gloomy golfer, as he dug up another slice of turf.—Pickup.

First Workingman—What sort of a job have you got now? Second Workingman—Oh, I collect alms on the Putreaux bridge, between midnight and 1 o'clock in the morning. First Workingman—Are the people particularly generous there at that hour? Second Workingman—Yes. They generally give me everything they have on them.—Paris Le Baionnette.

"You admit you were speeding?" "Yes, your honor." "A frank confession goes a long way in this court. What excuse have you for exceeding the speed limit?" "A man in a little old rattletrap flivver drove up behind me and bawled to me to get out of the way and let somebody use the street who could get more out of one cylinder than I could get out of six." "Umph! I do a little motoring myself. I'll let you off with the minimum fine this time."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

A Remembered President.

The anniversary of Grover Cleveland's birth (March 18th) passed without public celebration or even public notice; but his rugged personality and his great though undramatic public service are not forgotten, says the New York Times. Indeed, as time goes on there is a deeper and wider public appreciation of his stanch and unswerving statesmanship. Many in his own day saw ponderousness, stubbornness, and hardness in what, now in perspective, becomes heroic stature. It is certain that he is to be remembered among the great Presidents.

He was accustomed to go all the way around a matter before he made up his mind, but then he accepted the conclusion, whether it was for his own political or personal advantage or not. This sometimes had the appearance of headstrong will, but with him it was a moral obligation. That was the reason why one of the kindest and most sensitive of men had a reputation for being indifferent to public opinion and sometimes brutal in vetoing what others had voted. And the very heaviness of his official utterances was evidence of his scrupulous desire to tell the whole truth with utmost accuracy, to reveal the whole course by which his mind had reached its unalterable determination.

Richard Watson Gilder said of Mr. Cleveland that he was the "honestest man" he had ever known. His honesty was, however, not negative. It was of the aggressive sort that went out to meet dishonesty, and did not await attack. All in all, he was such a virile type of citizen and public servant as to invite the gratitude and admiration—and even affection—of a truly democratic people. Our generation should not fail to tell our children of him. Another 18th of March should not pass without observance of the day.

Superstition in Palestine.

The British administration in Palestine is trying to stamp out some of the peculiar superstitions of the peasants and has appointed a committee of district governors to advise it as to the best method of attaining that purpose.

After four years of occupation, the authorities are beginning to realize that superstition plays an important rôle in keeping the peasants in ignorance.

Some of the native beliefs are very interesting. One government official discovered that he had transgressed a tradition the other day when he stepped over a baby's coat as he crossed a village street.

His action was noticed by a group of women who halted him and told him he would have to retrace his steps or the baby would surely die. As their attitude was menacing, he did so to save himself from attack.

The same official on another occasion was invited to take lunch with the Moukhtar (head) of a village. As he entered the guest chamber, he stumbled and fell headlong on the floor. The host told him that his falling was sure to bring bad luck to the village unless he saw fit to forego the lunch.

It is a common practice for girls to visit Willies (prophets' tombs) and lay there pieces of their garments, believing that by so doing they are sure to get married soon. Sometimes they go without food or drink for seven days for the same purpose.

Married women who have no children, trying to avoid divorce, go to cemeteries and walk over children's tombs in order to have some of their own. Often, to be blessed with children, they go to mosques, walk seven times around the building, and then smash an egg in the gateway.

These are only a few of the odd customs which are commonly practiced by the peasants and which the government is anxious to destroy.

Hope from Genoa.

It would not be in the nature of things European just now to have the Genoa Conference open with the formal affability of a starched-up children's party. Since the Versailles treaty too much hate has been fermenting among the thirty-four nations represented, and many of the delegates are worse than strangers yet. Nevertheless, the frankness of Lloyd George, who knows about what to expect from the others in the way of contention for their national interests, will probably prove a good thing, just as the frankness of Secretary Hughes, when he opened the Armament Conference, cleared the way for getting right at the business in hand. Britain's interest is relief of unemployment through her export trade, and she can not be blamed if she tries for it. The most important new, unknown, and therefore dreaded element in the whole puzzle is the Russian one. That is a variant, for Bolshevism has broken down, and the Soviet government is trying to make the transition back to capitalism without conceding that communism has proved a stupid tragedy. It is said that Russia will try to retreat from communism and remain socialistic, but the statement is self-contradictory, for communism and socialism are essentially identical, no matter what milder definition socialists may try to give their creed. A government in such a transition is likely to do something surprising; and the Russian government has, in the proposal of Tchitcherin favoring disarmament. That brought discord in the shape of a protest from France, whose vital concern is defense. Lloyd George conceded that disarmament was not on the agenda, but declared the opinion that in spite of this fact, limitation would result. So shines a good deed in a naughty world, for if it does result, the Genoa Conference will be following the example of the Washington Conference, and working from President Harding's initiative toward the peace and future happiness of Europe. One shadow falls across the prospect: a member of the German delegation declares his country is greatly interested in Tchitcherin's proposal. Perhaps France will recognize it as something made in Germany.

A Bit of House-Cleaning.

President Harding's summary dismissal of the whole staff of thirty-two executive heads of the Department of Engraving and Printing has made a tremendous stir at Washington. It is taken to indicate that there is to be a house-cleaning in the various departments and bureaus of the government, something that is and has long been needed. Various stories are afloat as to the motives behind the President's action, and curiosity has not been appeased by the tart explanation that the dismissals were "for the good of the service." One report is to the effect that discovery has been made of frauds in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving by which the government has been mulcted of vast sums, although this theory finds no support in the positive statement of Secretary Mellon that "there is no suspicion of irregularities," and that dismissals were "for the sake of efficiency."

A pretty definite hint of another motive comes from a frank Republican congressman, intimate at the White House, to the effect that "there are four good reasons—Joseph P. Tumulty, A. Mitchel Palmer, Tim Ansberry, and Daniel C. Roper." This remark is interpreted as implying that there have been continuous leaks from the Department of Printing and Engraving and that the beneficiaries of the system have been a group of lawyers rather closely associated with the late administration. Gossip connects various executive departments with similar leaks. A member of the Cabinet is reported as complaining that if he wrote a letter Tumulty knew its contents before it got out of the town.

It is common understanding at Washington that through friends and agents, not only in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, but in various departments of the government, the old McAdoo-Tumulty organization is strongly entrenched. Certain it is that what is known as the "Tumulty crowd" is continually coming into possession of information which enables it to "hog" a vast volume of legal business growing out of governmental plans and doings. This comes about through the fact that the departments and bureaus were filled with men who got their appointments under the Democratic régime and largely through the favor of Tumulty. Gratitude for favors past with hope of profits to come are declared to be the motives which impel many confidential minor officials and employees to carry to their late patrons whatever may be of interest to them. It is freely alleged that information thus obtained becomes effective, not only for financial profit, but also for the political purpose of discrediting the Harding administration.

A Democratic theory for the dismissals in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving is that the President's order was made to get rid of Democrats and make places for Republicans, and this theory has some support in the fact that Attorney-General Daugherty declared before the House Committee on Appropriations last month that the civil service system is responsible for a marked decrease of efficiency in the conduct of government business. Admitted that this was an indiscreet remark, the fact nevertheless remains that it was a word of truth. No one who has had close observation of the work of the government can truthfully deny that civil service employees, taken as a whole, exhibit a low average of efficiency. But it is also true that the spoils system, while it was in vogue, did not produce a high average of efficiency. Neither under the system of political appointment nor under the so-called merit system does civil service work out ideally. Only impracticable idealists believe that any system in governmental service can approach in discipline and efficiency the results ordinarily achieved in private employments. The experience of the United States government is that of other countries. Complaints of governmental inefficiency in England are as frequent and as specific as those we hear at home. There has long been a popular belief that the civil service bureaucracy established under the German Empire was highly efficient, but that is not the testimony of those who knew the facts. Count von Bernstorff, formerly German Ambassador at Washington, and other experienced Germans might be quoted to the effect that German civil service under the empire was at many points slack and inefficient.

Apart from its relations with partisan politics, the civil service has become more or less a political machine. The Federal Employees' Union, with its membership scattered all over the country, articulating with other labor organizations, has become a power. It holds in its hands a club—and it does not hesitate to wield it—over timid congressmen and even over department heads. There is in its hands still another means of high effectiveness. The civil service people are always able to use the channels of publicity. Through their acquaintance with correspondents of the press and upon the basis of their inside knowledge of affairs and events, they have a whip which is used freely to bring into submission officials of any and every rank.

If it be true that action in the case of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving is the beginning of a general house-cleaning, it is further true that the movement comes none too soon. It is not too much to say that there is not a department nor a bureau of the administrative organization that would not be the better for thorough raking-over, purification, and fumigation.

Charity Begins at Home.

Of "drives" there is no end. They are urged in a hundred interests and in the name of every sentiment. They have become a burden and a pest. The one saving fact in the situation is that many, perhaps most of them, relate to interests that are sentimental rather than vital and imperative. Society can contrive to rub along without augmented facilities for higher education, without new or enlarged artistic centres, without taxing itself to provide world tours and uniforms for Columbia Park or other troupes of boys, without aiding the thousand-and-one organizations and projects calculated in the spirit of beneficence, æsthetics, vanity, or the interest of the promoters.

But there is one obligation which no community can shirk and which no man or woman of humanitarian spirit wishes to shirk. The care of orphaned or abandoned children is an obligation which not only appeals to fundamental sympathies, but which lays its command upon all. In San Francisco we have an agency that takes upon itself this first of community obligations, the care of those who may not care for themselves. To this work the Associated Charities brings experience, intelligence, devotion. How well it does its work only those who have had some observation of its methods and achievements may fully comprehend. Such an opportunity was given last week to the editor of the Argonaut, and his hat is off in respect, even in veneration, to the devoted group that is giving its skill, its time, its energies, its patience to carrying on a work whose obligation rests upon the whole community.

There are in San Francisco approximately 1400 phaned or abandoned children whose allowance from the state and county must be supplemented by donations to provide the necessities of life. This is done by the Associated Charities, not only done, but done with the kind of care that tends to transmute waifs into good citizens, all at a minimum cost. In addition, there are 1700 children to whom daily bread must be supplied to save them from starvation. This is not only a noble work, it is necessary work. It must be done if the community is to maintain its self-respect.

In the year 1921 the Associated Charities of San Francisco expended the sum of $557,042.47. Of every dollar .8733 was expended for food, clothing, and shelter, .0733 in relief and social service. Thus .9466 was spent for actual relief. The overhead administration and financial account took from the fund .0534—a little over 5 per cent. Ninety-four and two-thirds cents of every dollar provided for the Associated Charities went directly to relief of helpless humanity, the bulk of it for children.

Men and brethren, charity begins at home. Those who can do it may properly give to miscellaneous educational and artistic purposes; they may build opera houses and buy baseball bats for playgrounds. They may do usefully and with propriety these things and many more. But before all else there comes the community's obligation to care for those of its own who may not care for themselves. Before every other beneficent project or every other interest in San Francisco comes this, the greatest of all our charities, the care of helpless children.

The Associated Charities needs for the purposes above defined the sum of $275,000. This is the recommendation of a group of citizens who have studied the situation in all its bearings. They characterize it as truly "vital and urgent." Among those who after investigation have so declared are Wallace M. Alexander, William Sproule, John A. McGregor, Frederick J. Koster, Frank B. Anderson, Walton M. Moore, C. R. Johnson, Kenneth R. Kingsbury, Milton Esberg, William P. Roth, Robert I. Bentley, B. F. Schlesinger, Sig Stern, W. I. Brobeck, John Drum, William H. Crocker, Ansley K. Salz, Warren H. McBryde, and Andrew G. Griffin.

A "vital and urgent" call so attested must not go unheeded. This obligation is immediate and fundamentally it rests upon us all. Verily, charity begins at home.

China.

Word comes from Washington that out of the present confusion in China there is likely to come presently a new and unified government containing elements of potential strength. Here is the argument: Our old friend, Wu Ting Fang, is foreign minister under President Sun Yat Sen of the South Chinese Republic, claiming to be the constitutional government of China and with its capital at Canton. Wu Ting Fang and his associates in the South Chinese Republic denounce the government at Peking, headed by Hsu Shih Chang, as a usurpation. Wu Ting Fang has a very able son, young Wu, who has been in the north, at Mukden, for some weeks past consulting and advising with that picturesque and powerful ex-bandit and Manchurian military leader, Chang Tso Lin. It appears that young Wu has joined up with Chang Tso Lin and has become a member of the latter's staff. On this basis the South Chinese propagandists, both numerous and active at Washington, are declaring that Chang Tso Lin and Sun Yat Sen have formed an alliance.

Now an alliance of Sun Yat Sen and Chang Tso Lin would imply the end of the weak and trembling Peking government, which has existed only by sufferance of Chang Tso Lin, back of whom stands his highly efficient and rather more than less ruthless army in Manchuria. It is true that Chang's army and Sun Yat Sen's army are widely separated and that between them is established another army headed by Wei Pei Fu, owing presumptive allegiance to the Peking government, and in full control of the Yang-Tse Valley. Wei Pei Fu, of course, could not stand against a concerted aggressive movement from both his flanks, and if threatened he would very likely join up with the new combination. These possibilities are exciting the diplomats at Washington who are interested in Far Eastern affairs. It may be said that all evidences point to an alliance between Sun Yat Sen and Chang Tso Lin. If this shall really happen the result would be the return of Sun Yat Sen to Peking under Chang Tso Lin's protection and his reestablishment with his parliament in the capital from which he was expelled some years ago. With Sun Yat Sen as president and the powerful and adroit Chang Tso Lin supporting him, China would be in the way of having a stable government.

It is generally believed that Chang Tso Lin has been in the pay of the Japanese government and that the idea of the latter has been to employ him in extending its authority under the fiction of a North China Republic. This, however, is not certain and it has been the opinion of European observers that Chang would double-cross the Japanese at any time he might find it advantageous to do so. But however this may be, the North China Republic, under the authority of Chang Tso Lin, has been a weak affair, largely drawing such sources of strength as it possesses from the Japanese connection.

It hardly needs to be added that where there is so much confusion and so little integrity any or all calculations may fail. But there seems little doubt that the best hope of China lies in the success of Sun Yat Sen's Southern Republic with extension of its authority to the northern province. It has at least the merit of being under Chinese as distinct from Japanese inspiration. On the whole, as viewed from this distance it appears to be the best hope for the reorganization of China on broad national lines.

The fundamental difference between the Pekinese and the Cantonese governmental organizations appears to be the familiar one of conservatism and progressivism. The dominant ideals of the Pekinese group are those of old China; the ideals of the Cantonese group have been affected largely by contact of their leaders, notably Wu Ting Fang, with the Western world. There is, we fear, little of what we call patriotism, and still less of our ideals of integrity, on the part of either. But one thing is certain, namely, if China is to have share and part with the modern world it is more likely to come through her practical and progressive elements than through the dreamers and conservatives who have hitherto ruled at Peking and have held their country back from modern ideas of progress.

The Symphony Orchestra.

Within the week there has come to the Argonaut a half-score or more "Letters to the Editor" relative to the long-standing contention over the management and leadership of the Symphony Orchestra. They are withheld from publication since all are written in the spirit of critical partisanship and calculated rather to inflame than to allay the too passionate feeling that has been engendered between the Hertz and anti-Hertz factions. The Argonaut thus departs from its habit of permitting free expression through its columns respecting matters of public interest because it can not permit itself to be made a vehicle of rancor and contention.

In its comment of last week the Argonaut did not have in view the putting of fresh fuel upon the flames. Its hope, on the other hand, was to point the way to a friendly adjustment. Such an adjustment can come only through a fresh deal—with new leadership of the orchestra. The feeling over Mr. Hertz has reached a point where compromise is not practicable. So long as Mr. Hertz remains there will be contention and more contention; and a certain effect will be, if not to break down the Musical Association, to limit its efficiency. The trouble originated in sentiment—true or false, it does not matter—about the war. It bears no relationship to any other matter—either personal or (as some have suggested) racial. Any attempt to bring into it extraneous matters could only result in further estrangements among the musical community and in more serious damage to our musical interests.

The situation may be likened to the too-familiar squabbles in church organization, where one faction loves and the other hates some particular clergyman. In such cases there is but one remedy, namely, retirement of the man about whom the conflict rages. By this means, and by this means only, wounds may be healed, hatreds exorcised, and the spirit of brotherly love promoted. Precisely so in the case of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hertz is a bone of contention, and the passions related to it have their roots deep in the soil of national sentiment. The mischief began with the war and it continues as an aftermath of the war. That is all there is to it—all else is irrelevant.

Mr. Hertz is not to blame for his nationality, or his natural sympathies, whatever they were or are, or for the babblings of those who have championed him or those who have opposed him. He has done well with the orchestra. Under his leadership it has been brought to a high state of efficiency. But his continued leadership means nothing less serious than continued division and partial nullification of the forces that should make for maintenance of high musical standards and of coöperative spirit in the musical community.

The fact that partisans of Mr. Hertz have provided means for his continued leadership, while a notable tribute and a circumstance to be reckoned with, ought not to be decisive. It tends to promote discord rather than to develop harmony. Under the new financial prospects Mr. Hertz may or may not be able to remain. If he is a man of delicacy he will retire. He is, we hope, too much of a man, too much of a musician, too specifically a gentleman in character and spirit to permit himself to become a stumbling block in the path of the musical development of San Francisco.

The National "Pork Barrel."

The work of the government in development of the waterways of the country is done under the auspices of the War Department, but up to now funds for this purpose have been provided by special appropriation distinct from ordinary military expenditures. This year, for the first time, rivers and harbors appropriations are carried in the consolidated army appropriations bill. The change is not to the good, since appropriations for the maintenance of the army and navy are essentially national in character, related to the good of the entire country, while provision for rivers and harbors is parochial in character and spells individual political benefits. Some years ago in an endeavor to get away from log-rolling practice in the making of rivers and harbors appropriations the rule was established of appropriating a single lump sum for all projects. This left to a board of army engineers, having rivers and harbors work in charge, the duty of appropriating amounts to the several projects in accordance with the board's own estimate of their relative needs. This rule for a time eliminated log-rolling, but recently it has served to revive that practice in a new form. The lump-sum plan brings into the ranks of treasury raiders all those who entertain hopes that the board of engineers may increase the sums to be allotted to their own pet projects. Thus it is not difficult to rally support to proposals to increase the lump sum.

Rivers and harbors appropriations for the last ten years have aggregated $300,500,000, or an average of $30,050,000 a year. At the beginning of the present fiscal year, July 1, 1921, there was an unexpended balance on hand—the accumulation of previous appropriations—of $44,000,000. The army engineers estimate that by the end of this fiscal year, June 30th next, there will have been expended $30,000,000 of this balance, leaving on hand $14,000,000. Figuring upon this basis, the Budget Bureau's recommendation of $27,000,000 for the coming fiscal year, added to the unexpended balance of $14,000,000, will make a total of $41,000,000 for the year as against the maximum of $60,000,000 recommended by the board of engineers, a sum which the Budget Bureau held to be excessive when measured by the actual needs and the revenue resources. Now comes the House of Representatives, with the fall elections in mind, adding by special action the sum of $15,000,000 to the Budget Bureau's estimate, thus running the total for the year up to $56,000,000.

Thus the House takes the position that the Budget Bureau did not know what it was doing when it set the figure of $27,000,000 as sufficient for the new appropriation. Curiously enough, this is the same House that has rejected the Budget Bureau's estimate for the maintenance of the army and which presently is to reject the bureau's estimate for maintenance of the navy, cutting the appropriations for both services far below the line of safety marked by the Administration. Mondell, the Republican floor leader, at once saw the inconsistency of the House in its attitude to the two classes of appropriations. "Are we," he said, "to carry out our programme of economy? Are we to stand by the budget's estimates, or are our lines to break when organized assault is made by some of the members who have creeks from which they desire to have water hyacinths gathered or which they wish to have deepened for a navigation that is hoped for rather than expected?" Again, curiously, this is the same Mondell who has given aid and countenance in the matter of disregarding, not only the Budget Bureau's estimate for maintenance of the army, but against the Administration's advice against dangerous reduction in the national defense.

The whole business of appropriations for rivers and harbors has long been a scandal. It is not without point that the annual rivers and harbors appropriation bill has been styled the "pork barrel." The bill has been made up on the log-rolling principle—"you tickle me and I'll tickle you." Millions of government money have gone into unnecessary, whimsical, and even ridiculous projects, not for the purpose of promoting commerce, but to the sole end of assisting congressmen in maintaining support in their districts. Year by year the appropriation has increased, vast sums being expended where no good could possibly result, while important and necessary projects have been overlooked or carried on in a fitful and wasteful manner. There seems, as the latest action plainly indicates, small chance of reform. The plan by which rivers and harbors appropriations are tied up with the general army appropriation bill is poorly calculated to sustain an economic or effective rivers and harbors policy.

MARSHAL JOFFRE.

San Francisco Has Been Honored by a Visit from One of the Makers of History.

It has been the privilege of the people of California in recent months to come into contact with two of the eminent men of the world. Both were marshals of France, holders of the supreme military title of one of the great nations, living representatives of a long line of soldiers of the kingdom, the empire, and the republic. It is not often that a city such as San Francisco, in a situation relatively remote, is favored with the living presence of men supremely great.

Generations may come and pass onward and the time be unpropitious for the development of such men, or they may live and die and the opportunity never come for them to realize themselves. To the second decade of the twentieth century these words can not be said to apply. Whether for evil or for good, the years recently passed have been momentous ones. Much that seemed fixed has been overthrown and shattered. The wreck of the old order carried down with it a great part of the accumulated dross of men and institutions that time had gathered in some of the peoples of Europe. Weak and mediocre men holding high places have had their weakness and mediocrity exposed to the world, which has hurried them into oblivion. Great men, resting quietly in obscure positions, have suddenly been called upon to take up the burdens of humanity and to solve such of the complex problems of the time as their particular talents fitted them to deal with. Of all those who played well their parts in the great war none was called upon to bear greater responsibility or to make more momentous decisions, and none was found more firm and true, than he who was commander-in-chief of the army of France in 1914—the old soldier who crossed the Bay one sunny morning last week to his welcome in this city.

To one who observed him closely there was a touch of fatigue after his long journey, such as will come to a man no longer young. There was in his fine, kindly old face, however, that which fatigue could not conceal—the glance of clear intelligence and the evidence of that powerful and decisive mind which broke the greatest military organization the world has ever seen, and brought to naught plans of conquest and dominion matured and perfected through half a century. The photographs of Marshal Joffre fail to reveal his character. The military cap pulled low down covers quick eyes, and the grizzled moustache conceals in a way a firm, determined mouth. We are familiar with the sturdy figure, but from the photographs we can not know the man so well as we may after a few minutes of close observation.

It is well to go back and review the events that followed so swiftly on the decision of the German government to start the war it hoped would bring it world dominion. The sweep of the German armies through Belgium and northern France in the long days of August, 1914, seemed to warrant the confidence of the creators of the Teutonic military system. The perfected state socialism of the Germans had given their masters a machine that, apparently, nothing could stop. All through August and into September came the disheartening news of the retreat and disaster of the French armies and the small contingent of British troops on their left. Would the retreat ever stop, or would the French be rolled up and surrounded? Would there be another Sedan, and a Germany paramount over the civilized world? Of what happened in those days, much is obscure and much will never be told. The multitude of detail is too great ever to be set down in books, or even comprehended. What we do know is that behind all the obscurity one great man, supported by able generals, remained calm amid what appeared to be disaster and defeat. When the time came, when the position was correct and the forces were well in hand, the French commander turned his armies upon the pursuing Germans and inflicted upon them a reverse which in the issues at stake and in the magnitude of the forces engaged has no parallel in history.

The battle of the Grand Couronne de Nancy had been won by De Castelnau in the closing days of August, and this fact made possible the battle of the Marne. The French right was secure. Six armies lay along the rolling plains from Paris to Verdun under the commanders Maunoury, French, Franchet d'Esperey, Foch, Langle de Cary, and Sarraill, when on that memorable 5th of September the commander-in-chief, recognizing the exposed German right flank by a change in the direction of Von Kluck's march, ordered an attack the next morning along the whole line. The armies that had been fighting and retreating for many long days and nights suddenly turned on their pursuers. Across the hundred and twenty miles of plains, rivers, and hills rose a storm of battle the violence and magnitude of which had been until then unknown.

The perfected, automatic machine of the invaders proved inferior to the greater generalship, the clearer minds, and the more intelligent valor of the French. Men died by thousands to achieve that victory. In six days of conflict, the advance of the Germans had been stopped, their armies had been thrown back in confusion, and they had been driven in retreat to their prepared trenches on the Aisne. All the plans and preparations of years were undone and overturned. Four more years of fighting and the waste of war had to come before the menace of the German socialistic state would be finally removed from the world. Other men and other armies carried the conflict to its victorious end.

The battle of the Marne definitely ended the plan of a quick German triumph. On that wide field was determined, as at Marathon, the Metaurus, or at Tours, the course of human history for centuries to come. The principle of absolutism of rulers, of the domination of the state, and of the exploitation of peoples was settled against the advocates of those theories and in favor of the rights of the individual, the sanctity of national agreements, and the welfare of common humanity. The battle of the Marne was the turning point in the struggle, and future historians will relate its incidents, just as Creasy tells the tale of fifteen other famous fields where the fate of men and nations has been determined. An American officer, traversing the scene of this great battle while the war still held, noted where here and there the French and the British had struggled, and thought with keen regret that at this supreme crisis in world affairs his country was absent from the side of those who fought the battle of civilization.

Upon the shoulders of the man who was recently among us rested the supreme burden of this conflict. All other men in the vast army had some one above them to whom they could look for direction and command. Of all the millions engaged, he alone must determine for himself the situation, make his dispositions, and trust the fortunes of his country and civilization to the wisdom of his choice. That he was ably seconded by great generals and a great army is true, but upon the commander-in-chief lay the ultimate responsibility, and from it he could not escape. Fortunately, indeed, it was that at the head of the French armies was a man who embodied the best characteristics of that nation—firmness, calmness, and a clearness of mind and vision that in the end made them victors over the larger and better organized but less intelligent enemy. Marshal Joffre in his character and abilities is a true representative of the real French people, so little understood by Americans and so wilfully misrepresented by themselves.

The events of the great war are rapidly fading into the haze of the past. In time all those who took part in the struggle will disappear from the scene. In the long Gallery of Battles at Versailles some future painter of France will endeavor to depict the Marne battle, the portrait of the commander will be painted, and the pages of history will bear the record of the struggle. More fortunate are we who have been permitted to stand at gaze while the sturdy figure of the old soldier passed along our streets under the Tri-color and the Stars and Stripes. Greatness is rare in the world—or at least is hard to discover. Nature determines in an arbitrary manner where the truly great shall be born, and it is infrequently among the self-constituted rulers of men. An obscure town under the snowy mountains of France and Spain was the birthplace of Marshal Joffre. He was called upon in his time to bear the weight of a responsibility so crushing that few among the myriads of men could have carried it. Such supreme ability as he displayed in the hour of trial constitutes the real majesty of mankind. A great man has been with us for a few days, and has gone on. We have been signally honored.

Lord Byron used to make it his boast that he wrote for fame, not money, and in consequence declined for some time any remuneration for his poems.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Crime, Baseball, Rum Running, German Bonds, Theatrical Troubles, Coal, Billiards, and Politics.

NEW YORK, April 8, 1922.

More than 25,000 police permits to carry weapons have been issued recently under the Sullivan Act to persons doing business in the financial district. This is a slight indication of the prevalence of crime in New York, notwithstanding the dead line established some time ago at Chambers Street. Selling weapons except to persons holding permits is prohibited, and the theory seems to be that the police are sufficiently well acquainted with the crooks to issue permits only to prospective victims. The reply, or as a modern psychologist would call it, the reaction, of the crooks to this interference with their well-established trade has been to stock their arsenals by mail order. As one of them explained, it is very simple—just send five dollars to the proper persons in Chicago, with a letter, and you will receive a cheap but serviceable revolver. Citizens have been thinking of hiring body guards; which would provide employment for any number of highwaymen, and enable them to lead honest lives, after the manner of Bedouin sheiks. That would be another respect in which New York would resemble a desert.

The high cost of baseball has become a matter of interest with all real fanatics. It has been mounting rapidly of late, and the growing popularity of some of the stars has given little comfort to the club owners. The moving-picture interests have discovered that it is the public that makes the star, and when the public has made one, the producer feels that he has to pay about what the star demands. So does the star. A baseball performer's success is not quite so much a matter of popular favoritism, because he has to do something definite to get into the public eye, and repeat it often in order to stay there. Babe Ruth would not be much of a favorite without those long clouts into the bleachers, nor would he long remain a favorite if he only knocked one or two and tried to live the rest of the season on his laurels. But having become a star by grace of his big stick and the public's approval, and having shown ability to keep on hitting, he is almost in a position to have his askings, and they are much—$75,000 a year, it is intimated, or estimated, besides home-run bonuses. It is said that Rogers Hornsby, of the St. Louis National League team, cuts into his owners to the tune of $25,000 annually. Such figures are not yet common, but added to scores of lesser nicks in the gate receipts they help swell the cost of baseball this year to a figure well over $2,000,000, the wise believe. They are saying that salaries in the National League will reach $1,200,000, and that the total for the American League will probably top that.

Chief E. C. Yellowley of the general staff of prohibition agents thinks boot-legging conditions are improving, but so must the boot-leggers, if current information on the traffic is even approximately correct. The thirsty will be comforted to know that "rum" in its variety is pouring over the Canadian border into New York State by twenty-two roads, in high-powered automobiles, at seventy miles an hour, and it is said that many of the up-state farmers are profiting handsomely by participation in the business. Barns are being used for storage and "blending"—this blending being the introduction of various ingredients to swell the volume. It is on these that the consumer takes his chance, if they leave him a chance. The boot-legger's paradise in Canada is the little town of Valley Field. According to farmer testimony it is not unusual to hear from fifty to sixty cars of liquor pass in the night by a single road. One farmer owns up to making $500 shoveling snow for boot-leggers. The business must not be delayed.

Canada does not prohibit export if it is carried on by daylight, so the lake carriers of the contraband depart from the Canadian side before sunset, and make Grand Island in the Niagara River, where they wait for darkness. Speedy motor launches are to be put into service by the enforcement agents to block this traffic. Airplanes will be resorted to. There is also a plan to station fifty agents along the border, to report to a central agency at Buffalo. Yet lively as conditions are along the northern frontier, they are said to be much livelier in Florida, where great quantities of liquor are landed from the Bahamas and shipped to New York as fruits and vegetables. The profits are tremendous. One Florida operator has said that if he could get three carloads through to New York he could retire on a fortune.

The first German industrial bonds to be put out in this country since before the war will be offered by a New York house. These bonds are backed by the preferred stock of several industrial companies, and they are thought to be a sort of feeler for other issues, perhaps for government bonds later. Four of the largest banks in Germany have formed a fifth, known as the Bank für Industriewerte Actien Gesellschaft, and through it what is practically an investment trust has been formed. The B. I. A. Bank, as it is known in Germany, has acquired the stock of thirty-two large corporations, covering almost every industry in the country, and one of the significant facts about them is that their average dividends amounted to 12 per cent. in 1919, 15 per cent. in 1920, and 23 per cent. last year.

New York theatrical managers and producers have not been happy for a long time. They say the motion pictures have killed "the road," and that the local public has become fickle. Also, too many theatres have been built; or, rather, they have been built faster than the public demand has developed. Managerial troubles have been accentuated by some peculiar forms of unionism among actors and stage hands, and this has had some odd effects on the drama. The number of actors has become standardized at from seven to eleven—there are no more mob scenes with armies of supers; plays are not being written that way to any very great extent, or if they are they have small chance of acceptance. Ingenious devices have been evolved to avoid the use of scenery, but it has not been found possible to eliminate it altogether, so the drama has in many instances almost been forced into the form of three acts in one set, which can be built for the whole run and never changed. There are exceptions, but they have to be of extraordinary promise to tempt a producer into more dependence on scene shifters than he can avoid.

The latest phase of theatrical trouble takes the form of more litigation between the erstwhile partners in production, Klaw and Erlanger. Last summer Abraham Erlanger staged "Two Little Girls in Blue," a musical comedy of merit, at the George M. Cohan Theatre on Broadway. It paid a little and then lost a little and finally closed. Now comes Marc Klaw on behalf of himself and other stockholders of the theatre alleging that the original lease provided that the theatre should take 35 per cent. of the gross receipts, but that after they began declining, and while Klaw was abroad, the arrangement was so altered that the receipts were pooled, the theatre to take half the profits. This was not so good for the theatre as the original arrangement, and Klaw wants his former partner to make up the difference. If the drama is to be dragged through the courts some people are wondering where it will bring up. However, this is not the first dramatic litigation.

A new development in the coal strike situation is expected by well-informed people here, in the shape of an entrance into the controversy by the consumers of coal. Officials of the United Mine Workers have admitted that representatives of certain consumers' interests, including many in New England, have broached the question of a hearing at the conference between the anthracite miners and the operators. This conference is being held at the Union League Club, and the negotiations are quite private, but bulletins of a formal character are handed out. They are written like the "minutes of the last meeting," but thus far are less interesting. Meanwhile it is learned from sources outside the conference that a considerable number of Russian and Czechoslovakian miners are going back to Europe, some at the invitation of Big Bill Heywood, who, it is said, wants 7000 of them to operate a coal concession under the Soviet government of Russia. It would not be a very large proportion of the 600,000 men supposed to be out.

The government has begun the trial of forty-four individuals and nineteen corporations, all members of the Cement Manufacturers' Protective Association, for violation of the Sherman anti-trust act. This is said to be the first prosecution based upon the open price competition plan for the exchange of information. The defendants say there was no illegality in the exchange, but the government claims that they were thereby enabled to control both the supply and the price, and that they monopolized the manufacture of 90 per cent. of the cement made in the East.

Willie Hoppe, for sixteen years the world's champion balkline billiardist, but recently beaten by young Jake Schaefer, has permanently retired, according to a statement of his manager, R. B. Benjamin. He and Benjamin and Charles Peterson, the fancy-shot expert of St. Louis, will establish a string of billiard halls, and Hoppe will devote his time to their management, and to instruction.

Politicians are always looking for any little rift between Mayor Hylan and Hearst. Some think they see the beginning of one in the recent appointment of a Tammany man to succeed a Hearst man on the board of water supply, with a salary of $12,000 a year and little to do. This job was held by the late L. J. O'Reilly, Hearst's political lieutenant. Hylan has now appointed to fill it Philip J. Donohue, treasurer of Tammany Hall. Since the completion of the Catskill aqueduct system, the board of water supply has not had much to do, and there has been talk of abolishing it. That, however, would be too much for the taxpayers to hope for. They can only try to guess whether this means coolness between Hylan and Hearst, or a still closer bond of sympathy between Hearst, Hylan, and Charlie Murphy, warm places for more of their friends, and former Governor Al Smith on the outside trying to look in. A Hylan appointment always means something beyond mere work for the appointee.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Sigfried Wagner, son of the noted composer, will visit the United States shortly to enlist American aid in reviving the Bayreuth Festival in 1923. The festival is a season of Wagner music in the National Theatre, which the composer opened in 1876.

Charles Keck, New York sculptor, is putting the finishing touches on a statue to be presented to the Brazilian government by the American Chamber of Commerce in Rio de Janeiro. The statue is next in size only to Miss Liberty, which it closely resembles.

"The Angel of Siberia" is the title bestowed upon Miss Elsa Brandstrom of Sweden, Red Cross worker, by the Russian war prisoners and civilians. Miss Elsa, who is the daughter of General Edward Brandstrom, for many years Swedish Minister to Petrograd under the Czarist régime, is planning to visit the United States in the interests of the Russian famine sufferers.

A unique memorial to Rear-Admiral Robert E. Peary was unveiled by his daughter, Mrs. Edward Stafford ("the Snow Baby"), in the Arlington National Cemetery on the thirteenth anniversary of Peary's discovery of the North Pole, April 6th. The memorial is in the shape of a huge granite spheroid fashioned to represent the earth, with the North Pole indicated by a bronze star.

Not every one is aware that Paul Revere's descendants are still going strong and doing honor to their historic name. The present representative is Paul Revere, 7th, a six-foot-two youngster of Brookline, who has just celebrated his nineteenth birthday. It is in April near the anniversary of the famous midnight ride of April 19, 1775. The seventh Paul wears the uniform of the Lenox Road Cadets.

One of the chiefs of the Fiji Islands has a remarkable record. Descendant of a famous line of chieftains, he is also an Oxford graduate, served as cook with the R. M. A. Corps in France in 1916, and later as a clerk with the Royal Scotch Borderers. He has been medaled by King George for bravery. Despite his good running start, he has deserted civilization and returned to the South Pacific to live among his fellow Fiji Islanders.

The first official envoy of the Irish Free State has arrived at Washington in the person of Timothy Smiddy. Professor Smiddy is dean of the faculty of commerce at University College, Cork, and professor of economics at the University of Cork. He is a member of the trade boards of Ireland and the author of various publications on economic subjects. Professor Smiddy, who is one of Ireland's most learned economists, is in his middle forties. He will serve here as special representative of the Dail Eireann until the election of a successor by the Irish Free State.

King Alfonso of Spain has turned horse enthusiast. All the eminent nobles are supporting the king in the campaign to put Spain on the sporting map and plans are afoot to make racing in Madrid claim the attention of the world. It seems likely that the Spanish racing of 1922 will assume all the importance of the English Derby or the Paris Grand Prix. Mr. Harry Payne Whitney and Reginald Vanderbilt are seeking entries and several British sportsmen are already erecting shelters for their steeds in Madrid. Alphonso is president of the Jockey Club, which has all the arrangements in hand.

Captain John Lyon is the oldest skipper on the Hudson River today. He is eighty-eight years old and has been employed on Hudson River steamboats for seventy-one years. Before the Nyack-Tarrytown ferry was installed he used to run a steamboat which brought commuters to New York each morning from Hudson River towns. Among his passengers were Horace Greeley and Admiral Farragut. The skipper of the Tappan Zee, as Captain Lyon is known in his home village of Nyack, is a short, white-haired, red-faced Scotchman. He is said to know the Tappan Zee even better than Washington Irving did.

Mr. Richard E. Pennoyer has reentered the diplomatic service and is now chargé d'affaires of the American Embassy in Berlin, awaiting the coming of the ambassador, Mr. Alan Houghton. Mr. Pennoyer is the husband of Lady Winifred Ingestre, whose American marriage caused so many complications, because of her small son's succession to the senior earldom of Great Britain—that of Shrewsbury. Lady Ingestre is compelled to reside in England with the young earl, who has succeeded his grandfather. Lady Ingestre, however, makes frequent visits to Berlin, being a plucky aviator and not averse to the rapid flights over the North Sea. Mr. Pennoyer has been in the diplomatic service for nearly ten years. He is a resident of Oakland, California.

Mr. J. Alfred Spender, who has retired after a quarter of a century from the editorship of the Westminster Gazette, is said to be the last of the "great editors" of the old English school. He was among the last of the great editors to stamp his paper with his own mentality. His qualifications for intellectual liberal journalism—of which the Westminster Gazette is the most conspicuous exponent—were great. The son of a well-known woman novelist, and himself the product of Oxford's finest culture, he knew intimately all the great men of Liberalism during his time. He received the confidences of every considerable Liberal from Harcourt and Rosebery to Asquith and Lloyd George. His interest was always in opinions and never in news except as it was conducive to opinion. It is not strange in this sensation-loving age that the Westminster Gazette has not a large circulation. Mr. Spender is the author of several books of a critical and political nature.

OLD FAVORITES.

Fairy Land.

Over hill, over dale,
Thorough bush, thorough brier,
Over park, over pale,
Thorough flood, thorough fire,
I do wander everywhere,
Swifter than the moon's sphere;
And I serve the fairy queen,
To dew her orbs upon the green:
The cowslips tall her pensioners be;
In their gold coats spots you see;
Those be rubies, fairy favours,
In those freckles live their savours:
I must go seek some dew-drops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.

You spotted snakes with double tongue,
Thorny hedgehogs, be not seen;
Newts and blind-worms, do no wrong;
Come not near our fairy queen.

Philomel, with melody,
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby; lulla, lulla, lullaby!
Never harm,
Nor spell nor charm,
Come our lovely lady nigh;
So, good-night, with lullaby.

Weaving spiders, come not here;
Hence, you long-legg'd spinners, hence!
Beetles black, approach not near;
Worm nor snail, do no offense.

Philomel, with melody,
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby; lulla, lulla, lullaby!
Never harm,
Nor spell nor charm,
Come our lovely lady nigh;
So, good night, with lullaby.

Come unto these yellow sands,
And then take hands:
Court'sied when you have, and kiss'd,—
The wild waves whist,—
Foot it feathery here and there;
And, sweet sprites, the burthen bear.
Hark, hark!
Bow, wow,
The watch-dogs bark:
Bow, wow,
Hark, hark! I hear
The strain of strutting chanticleer
Cry, Cock-a-diddle-doo!

Where the bee sucks, there suck I:
In a cowslip's bell I lie;
There I couch when owls do cry.
On the bat's back I fly
After summer merrily:
Merrily, merrily, shall I live now,
Under the blossom that hangs on the bough.

Full fathom five thy father lies;
Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes:
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea-change
Into something rich and strange:
Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell:
Ding-dong.

Hark! now I hear them—
Ding-dong, bell!
—William Shakespeare.

A Pilgrim's Way.

I do not look for holy saints to guide me on my way,
Or male and female devils to lead my feet astray.
If these are added, I rejoice—if not, I shall not mind,
So long as I have leave and choice to meet my fellow-kind.
For as we come and as we go (and deadly soon go we!)
The people, Lord, Thy people, are good enough for me!

Thus I will honour pious men whose virtue shines so bright (Though none are more amazed than I when I by chance do right).

And I will pity foolish men for woe their sins have bred (Though ninety-nine per cent. of mine I brought on my own head).

And, Amorite or Emerite, or General Averagee,
The people, Lord, Thy people, are good enough for me!

And when they bore me overmuch, I will not shake mine ears,
Recalling many thousand such whom I have bored to tears.
And when they labour to impress, I will not doubt nor scoff:
Since I myself have done no less and—sometimes pulled it off.
Yea, as we are and we are not, and we pretend to be,
The people, Lord, Thy people, are good enough for me!

And when they work me random wrong, as oftentimes hath been,
I will not cherish hate too long (my hands are none too clean).

And when they do me random good I will not feign surprise,
No more than those whom I have cheered with wayside charities.

But, as we give and as we take—what'er our takings be—
The people, Lord, Thy people, are good enough for me!

But when I meet with frantic folk who sinfully declare
There is no pardon for their sin, the same I will not spare Till I have proved that Heaven and Hell which in our hearts we have
Show nothing irredeemable on either side the grave.
For as we live and as we die—if utter Death there be—
The people, Lord, Thy people, are good enough for me!
—Rudyard Kipling in "The Years Between."

A GOOD AMERICAN AND HIS TIMES.

Senator Depew Contributes to History Some Reflections on His Eighty Years.

He is probably the most successful, and deservedly successful, man this country ever produced whose name was Chauncey. Once at a political meeting the Bowery named him "The Peach," and he accepted it as an honor, and became "Chauncey the Peach." It was only one of his many honors, and they were all well earned. Now he is eighty-seven years old, hale and strong, going to business every day, and he will probably make it a hundred. He has caught the "mirror" habit, and contributes to his later times "My Memories of Eighty Years," which are admirable reflections of his earlier days—all those days, in fact, of which he was a part. He has been a United States senator. He has been president of a great railway company, and is now chairman of its board of directors. He has seen the formation and development of the Vanderbilt system, and of many another, and of the Republican party. Of that party he has been a conspicuous member, and he has wielded a strong influence in its councils. He has seen it grow and has helped it grow, always seeming to understand what was needed, and what could be done, with a strong, sure common sense and a limitless fund of good nature and charity for human failings. If there is a typical, or composite, American gentleman, it is probably Senator Depew.

It can not be said that his beginnings were humble or surrounded by the hardships of the frontier. If they had been it is doubtful if he could have become such a perfect cosmopolite, in addition to being such a good American.

His connection with the Republican party began with its inception. His connection with what became the New York Central Railroad has covered practically the whole period of the construction and development of railroads in the United States. To be a part of such history is to touch the heights of life. And Senator Depew was always a creditable part of it. He is not the greatest man the country ever produced, but what a marvel of a country it would be if every citizen had his ability, and integrity and cheerfulness! His "Memories" are largely of men, and in good part anecdotal. He must have seen a lot of rascality in his time, but there is no bitterness in his book. It considerably enriches our annals. It is not exhaustive biography, but a quite distinct and highly colored thread in the weaving of the national texture.

Chauncey Depew had the advantages of a college education. He notes no disadvantages, but his observations on certain studies have value as the opinion of a highly successful man. He tells us:

I entered Yale in 1852 and graduated in 1856. The college of that period was very primitive compared with the university to which it has grown. Our class of ninety-seven was regarded as unusually large. The classics and mathematics, Greek and Latin, were the dominant features of instruction. Athletics had not yet appeared, though rowing and boat-racing came in during my term. The outstanding feature of the institution was the literary societies: the Linonia and the Brothers of Unity. The debates at the weekly meetings were kept up and maintained upon a high and efficient plane. Both societies were practically deliberative bodies and discussed with vigor the current questions of the day. Under this training Yale sent out an unusual number of men who became eloquent preachers, distinguished physicians, and famous lawyers. While the majority of students now on leaving college enter business or professions like engineering, which is allied to business, at that time nearly every young man was destined for the ministry, law, or medicine. My own class furnished two of the nine judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and a large majority of those who were admitted to the bar attained judicial honors.

It is a singular commentary on the education of that time that the students who won the highest honors and carried off the college prizes, which could only be done by excelling in Latin, Greek, and mathematics, were far outstripped in after-life by their classmates who fell below their high standard of collegiate scholarship, but were distinguished for an all-around interest in subjects not featured in the college curriculum.

The civil war closed in 1865, and one of its lessons had been the necessity for more railroads. Depew entered the law department of the Vanderbilt system in 1866, when that system consisted of the Hudson River and Harlem roads; the Harlem 128 miles long, the Hudson River 140. The total railway mileage of the country was then 36,000. The Vanderbilt system now covers 20,000, and the total for the country has grown to 261,000. Our internal commerce is greater in volume than the whole foreign trade of the world; and this "has all come about during the period covered by the official career of a railroad man who is still in the service: an attorney in 1866, a vice-president in 1882, president in 1885, chairman of the board of directors in 1899, and still in that office."

Depew has always been an indefatigable speaker—not a great orator, but a ready and acceptable and convincing one, prepared on his subjects in advance, and capable of meeting an emergency on his feet. It was a gift that made him a great political campaigner, and we mean no discourtesy when we say that for two generations and part of a third he has been a great war-horse, wheel-horse, and fire-horse of the Republican party. He has fought its battles. He has helped haul its load on some very sharp turns. He has galloped to every party conflagration and helped put it out, when that was possible. He has deserved well of the Republicans, and they have done pretty well by him, although they did not make him President. Perhaps it is just as well. Perhaps we are not yet ready for a railroad president in the White House, and perhaps they could not have landed him there. His good-natured observations on politics now are illuminating and diverting. Of conventions he may be presumed to know something, and he is worth heeding when he says of them:

Political conventions are the most interesting of popular gatherings. The members have been delegated by their fellow-citizens to represent them, and they are above the average in intelligence and political information of conditions in the state and nation, as the convention represents the state or the republic. The belief that they are generally boss-governed is a mistake. The party leader, sometimes designated as boss, invariably consults with the strongest men there are in the convention before he arrives at a decision. He is generally successful, because he has so well prepared the way, and his own judgment is always modified and frequently changed in these conferences.

When it came to choosing a running-mate for Taft the party managers were confronted by an embarrassment of material. They wanted to nominate James Sherman, but a lot of good men were in the way. So they resorted to dangerous strategy:

The method adopted by one of the leading managers was both adroit and hazardous. He would call up a candidate on the telephone and say to him: "The friends of Mr. Taft are very favorable to you for Vice-President. Will you accept the nomination?" The candidate would hesitate and begin to explain his ambitions, his career and its possibilities, and the matter which he would have to consider. Before the prospective candidate had finished, the manager would say, "Very sorry, deeply regret," and put up the telephone.

When the nomination was made these gentlemen who might have succeeded would come around to the manager and say impatiently and indignantly: "I was all right. Why did you cut me off?" However, these gentlemen have had their compensation. Whenever you meet one of them he will say to you: "I was offered the vice-presidency with Taft, but was so situated that I could not accept."

This "inner light" on party politics as practiced in the United States does no harm, and serves to illustrate the nature of the task of management. It proceeds from intimate knowledge of men and events, and the material dates back to the civil war and the days of reconstruction. There is some interesting campaign history on the second election of Lincoln. The Democrats nominated General McClellan, and "here occurred," says our author, "one of those little things which so often in our country have turned the tide." He explains:

The platform committee, and the convention afterwards, permitted to go into the platform a phrase proposed by Clement C. Vallandigham of Ohio, the phrase being, "The war is a failure." Soon after the adjournment of the convention, to the victories of Farragut and Sherman was added the spectacular campaign and the victory of Sheridan in the Valley of Shenandoah. The campaign at once took on a new phase. It was the opportunity for the orator.

It is difficult now to recreate the scenes of that campaign. The people had been greatly disheartened. Every family was in bereavement, with a son lost and others still in the service. Taxes were onerous and economic and business conditions very bad. Then came this reaction, which seemed to promise an early victory for the Union. The orator naturally picked up the phrase, "The war is a failure"; then he pictured Farragut tied to the shrouds of his flagship; then he portrayed Grant's victories in the Mississippi campaign, Hooker's "battle above the clouds," the advance of the Army of the Cumberland; then he enthusiastically described Sheridan leaving the War Department hearing of the battle in Shenandoah Valley, speeding on and rallying his defeated troops, reforming them and leading them to victory, and finished with reciting some of the stirring war poems.

Mr. Lincoln's election under the conditions and circumstances was probably more due to that unfortunate phrase in the Democratic platform than to any other cause.

A man who served as long in the United States Senate as Chauncey Depew may be presumed to know something about it. Despite its dignity and its fine old traditions, it always contains possibilities of Rumpus Ridge effects in debate. Here is a delightful little picture of it in this aspect:

One of the characters of the Senate, and one of the upheavals of the Populist movement was Senator Jeff Davis of Arkansas. Davis was loudly, vociferously, and clamorously a friend of the people. Precisely what he did to benefit the people was never very clear, but if we must take his word for it, he was the only friend the people had. Among his efforts to help the people was to denounce big business of all kinds and anything which gave large employment or had great capital. I think that in his own mind the ideal state would have been made of small landowners and an occasional lawyer. He himself was a lawyer.

One day he attacked me, as I was sitting there listening to him, in a most vicious way, as the representative of big corporations, especially railroads, and one of the leading men in the worst city in the world, New York, and as the associate of bankers and capitalists. When he finished Senator Crane went over to his seat and told him that he had made a great mistake, warned him that he had gone so far that I might be dangerous to him personally, but in addition to that, with my ridicule and humor, I would make him the laughing-stock of the Senate and of the country. Jeff, greatly alarmed, waddled over to my seat and said: "Senator Depew, I hope you did not take seriously what I said. I did not mean anything against you. I won't do it again, but I thought that you would not care, because it won't hurt you, and it does help me out in Arkansas." I replied: "Jeff, old man, if it helps you, do it as often as you like." Needless to say, he did not repeat.

Like the "Mirrors of Downing Street" and the "Mirrors of Washington," these memoirs deal with noted personalities. There are chapters devoted to Lincoln, Grant, Conkling, Greeley, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur, Cleveland, Benjamin Harrison, Blaine, McKinley, and Roosevelt. Some of these are character sketches, without being pretentious or in any sense labored. Depew had the breadth of mind to admire Grover Cleveland, and says of him: "He had more political courage of the General Jackson type than almost any man who ever held great responsible positions. If he had once made up his mind and believed he was right, no suggestions of expediency or popularity had any influence on him." Cleveland's difficulties in advancing civil service reform awakened our author's sympathy, and he says:

There was an aggravation, also, growing out of the fact that the Democrats had been out of office for twenty-four years. We can hardly visualize or conceive now of their hunger for office. The rule for rescuing people dying of starvation is to feed them in very small quantities, and frequently. By trying this, the President became one of the most unpopular of men who had ever held office; in fact, so unpopular among the Democratic senators and members of the House that a story which Zebulon Vance of North Carolina told went all over the country and still survives. Vance, who had a large proportion of the citizens of North Carolina on his waiting list, and could get none of them appointed, said that the situation, which ought to be one of rejoicing at the election of a president of his own party, was like that of a client of his who had inherited a farm from his father. There were so many difficulties about the title and getting possession of it and delay, that the son said: "I almost wish father had not died."

However, Mr. Cleveland in his deliberate way did accomplish the impossible. He largely regained favor with his party by satisfying their demands, and at the same time so enlarged the scope of civil-service requirements as to receive the commendation of the two great leaders of the civil-service movement—George William Curtis and Carl Schurz.

Cleveland's courses in regard to the railroad strike of his day and in regard to the sound money issue are thus recounted:

A strike of the men on the railroads tied up transportation. Railroads are the arteries of travel, commerce, and trade. To stop them is to prevent the transportation of provisions or of coal, to starve and freeze cities and communities. Cleveland used the whole power of the Federal government to keep free the transportation on the railways and to punish as the enemies of the whole people those who were trying to stop them. It was a lesson which has been of incalculable value ever since in keeping open these great highways.

He forced through the repeal of the silver purchasing law by every source and pressure and the unlimited use of patronage. His party were almost unanimous for the silver standard and resented this repeal as a crime, but it saved the country from general bankruptcy. Except in the use of patronage to help his silver legislation, he offended his party by improving the civil service and retaining Theodore Roosevelt as head of the Civil Service Commission. These crises required from the President an extraordinary degree of courage and steadfastness.

Here is a little characterization of President Benjamin Harrison of more than passing interest:

It was said of him by a senator who was his friend, and the remark is quoted by Senator Hoar, that if he spoke to an audience of ten thousand people, he would make every one of them his friend, but if he were introduced to each of them afterwards, each would depart his enemy. I think that his manner, which was so unfortunate, came from the fact that his career had been one of battle, from his early struggles to his triumphant successes.

McKinley and Roosevelt, as unlike as two good men in the same office might well be, are thus treated, in part:

President McKinley had spent most of his life in the House of Representatives. He loved the associations and life of Congress. The most erratic and uncertain of bodies is Congress to an executive who does not understand its temper and characteristics. McKinley was past master of this. Almost every President has been greatly relieved when Congress adjourned, but Mr. McKinley often expressed to me his wish that Congress would always be in session, as he never was so happy as when he could be in daily contact with it. His door was open at all times to a senator or a member of the House of Representatives. If either failed to see him at least once a week, the absentee usually received a message stating that the President desired him to call.

When Mr. Roosevelt as Vice-President came to preside over the Senate, it was soon evident that he would not be a success. His talents were executive and administrative. The position of the presiding officer of the United States Senate is at once easy and difficult. The Senate desires impartiality, equable temper, and knowledge of parliamentary law from its presiding officer. But it will not submit to any attempt on the part of the presiding officer to direct or advise it, and will instantly resent any arbitrary ruling. Of course, Mr. Roosevelt presided only at a few meetings before the final adjournment. When Congress met again he was President of the United States.

On another occasion I was entering his private office as another senator was coming out of the Cabinet room, which was filled. He called out: "Senator Depew, do you know that man going out?" I answered: "Yes, he is a colleague of mine in the Senate." "Well," he shouted, "he is a crook." His judgment subsequently proved correct.

There are views of European men of note in a most interesting chapter entitled "Recollections from Abroad." He met Browning on one occasion, and gives us this significant note on the Browning cult, which might apply to all similar ones:

Mr. Browning said that nothing gratified him so much as the popularity of his works in the United States. He was especially pleased and also embarrassed by our Browning societies, of which there seemed to be a great many over here. They sent him papers which were read by members of the societies, interpreting his poems. These American friends discovered meanings which had never occurred to him, and were to him an entirely novel view of his own productions.

The author discusses "Ambassadors and Ministers," "Governors of New York State," "Fifty-Six Years with the New York Central Railroad Company," "Orators and Campaign Speakers," "National Republican Conventions," "Journalists and Financiers," "Actors and Men of Letters," and "Societies and Public Banquets," all in the happiest vein of reminiscence and anecdote. It might have been greater history, but it could not have been better entertainment.

MY MEMORIES OF EIGHTY YEARS. By Chauncey M. Depew. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending April 8, 1922, were $140,200,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $116,700,000; a gain of $23,500,000.

The bond market was characterized by active investment buying from February 16th to March 15th, and the market strength of recent months showed no abatement. The improvement in foreign exchange during the earlier part of the period was reflected in ad-

$685,000,000 for the corresponding period of 1921. Of the total, $430,000,000 were United States government issues, $229,000,000 were railroad bonds, and $263,000,000 were bonds of other kinds. Increases over 1921 occurred in all classes, but transactions in United States government bonds constitute a smaller proportion of the year's total to date than they did a year ago. A striking feature of the present market is the active trading in foreign issues.

Total transactions in bonds on the New York Stock Exchange from February 16th to March 15th were $337,000,000, compared with $367,000,000 from January 16th to February 15th. New bonds and notes offered on this market during the period closing March 15th were $350,000,000, compared with over $400,000,000 during the preceding period, which was longer by three business days. Foreign issues totaled approximately $150,000,000.

On March 8th the Secretary of the Treasury announced an issue of $250,000,000 one-year 4½ per cent. treasury certificates, which was heavily oversubscribed. Foreign offerings continue to be of great importance. A $27,000,000 issue of 7 per cent. gold bonds of Argentina due February 1, 1927, was offered at 99 to yield about 7.25 per cent. A second block of $40,000,000 twenty-five-year 6 per cent. bonds of the Dutch East Indies was offered at 94¾, to yield about 6.73 to 6.35, according to redemption date.

A considerable part of the foreign offerings of the period has been issued in foreign currencies. Midi Railroad Company bonds amounting to 25,000,000 francs were promptly absorbed. The outstanding issue, however, was that of the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The total amount was 150,000,000 guilders, equivalent to about $60,000,000, of fifty-year bonds, callable after ten years. Half the issue 75,000,000 guilders, was made in the United States, the other half in Holland, and both offerings were promptly subscribed. A unique feature of this issue, as contrasted with foreign obligations offered here heretofore, is that principal and interest are not payable in United States currency. They are expressly payable in guilders at the prevailing rate of foreign exchange. At par the guilder is worth 40.20 cents. On March 15th it was currently quoted at 3.55 cents.

The sale of railroad equipment trust certificates has continued, the total amount of such certificates sold by the government to March 15th being $220,791,000.

The feature in the steel trade lately has been a sharp price advance in bars, shapes, and plates announced by the independent concerns. Lest too much importance be attached to this development, however, it should be remembered that prices for these lines had been ruling a good deal below the average of pre-war years, while on the other hand averages of other products, and especially of steel rails, are still far and away above the pre-war averages. There has been an increasing amount of buying of late mostly for prompt delivery due possibly to the fear of the coal strike interrupting trade. There are reports from time to time of foreign competition making some inroads upon our markets, and this feature of the situation may be watched closely for possible effects later on prices.

Considerable improvement in the copper metal situation has taken place of late and prices have advanced somewhat. The European outlook, however, is not so favorable as to suggest any extraordinary copper demand for export.

Notwithstanding the increase in the value of grain held by our farmers on account of the recent advance in the market, estimated at over $550,000,000, it is figured that there has been an almost similar gain in the value of livestock. This heartens the farmer, but before we jump to the conclusion that it all means a remarkable revival in purchasing power of our agricultural communities one may take note that a high Federal Reserve official is responsible for the statement that the frozen loans in the farming communities are still a grave problem. The higher prices for his product, however, will make the farmer anxious to grow larger crops and raise more livestock, and this will mean a strenuous demand upon the banking resources in the agricultural districts.

We have had pretty good reactions in some of the grains after their recent sensational advances, and while the market may be a dangerous one, especially in wheat, it looks like May wheat is a much better purchase on weak places than it will prove a sale on strong ones.

Reports from a government experiment station in Louisiana suggest that the 1922 cotton crop is facing prospects of a more serious depreciation from boll weevil than has ever been known, and particularly in the valley and general lowlands, where the cotton is prone to thrive luxuriantly. The advice is given that considerable damage may be averted by very early planting. There seems to be a better feeling in the South, so far as acreage is concerned, but of course the 1922 crop is hardly subject for estimation at this time, and the present surplus is certainly none too large.

The stock market has drifted into a specialty affair, with public participation showing a tendency to increase, but as yet no such wide public buying as to suggest one of the big shake-outs characteristic of a market that is overbought all around. There are plenty of stocks in which definite distribution has taken place and which when the time comes will not show that character of supporting orders necessary to prevent a decided slump, but in the main sentiment is hopeful, and if the coal strike does not develop much more serious tendencies than may be expected it would seem reasonable policy to follow the movement in the special stocks.

Recent advances in stocks like Kelsey Wheel, American Ice, May Stores, Kresge, and Woolworth reflect confident belief of the larger interests concerned in these properties that there will be some very agreeable news for shareholders who are patient.

Some of the independent steel stocks seem to be headed for a sort of bull circus a little later in connection with merger deals. Stocks like Midvale Steel, Republic Steel, and Lackawanna Steel have intrinsic value of at least twice their present selling price on the average and their book values run a good deal higher. These companies, it is believed, will enter into merger plans, and as a consequence their stocks will likely be exciting a good deal of bullish attention from time to time.

There is much that may be said of some of the standard rails and better class of preferred industrials in reference to the easier tendencies in the money market, while there are not a few long-priced rails which offer exceedingly attractive opportunities for the long pull. Among the latter the stocks of such reorganized companies as Wabash, Missouri Pacific, Western Pacific, St. Louis & San Francisco, Wheeling & Lake Erie, and Seaboard Airline would seem particularly attractive. There are other stocks like the Toledo, St. Louis & Western, Texas & Pacific, Colorado Southern, the St. Louis Southwestern, and Kansas City Southern that should do very well for one to buy for the long pull with a fair prospect of seeing 50 to 100 per cent. profit in his money during the next year. All this, of course, in event that the railroad and coal labor situations work out reasonably well.—The Trader.

The United States Steel Corporation has followed the lead of the independent interests in advancing prices here and there in the trade, and further price advances are to be expected. This development is possibly merely a seasonal one, though it may be confessed that the independent steel companies have in the main been losing money for some lic improvements, and especially the fact that at last bankers are again disposed to finance sound public utility and electrical enterprises generally is creating an undertone of favorable sentiment which affects, not only the copper, but other metal markets.

Labor unrest has at times influenced selling in the commodity markets, and particularly in cotton, but the cotton situation seems unduly sound.

State-owned plants for power development mean destructive competition in an industry that is particularly strong in the West.

Either the state is to sink the money of the taxpayer on an experimental competition or competition is to attack existing plants.

In Western states plans are under way to develop from $20,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year of hydro-electric power with new capital.

Is it better to bring this capital from the outside or within the state into active use or to issue state bonds and burden taxpayers?

The development of power plants and distribution of hydro-electric power is proceeding as normally as the construction of the railroads was before Federal and state regulation and operation intervened.

State and Federal socialism are not adapted to the needs of the American people and are not fitted to our institutions and theories of government and will wreck and bankrupt states and nation if kept up.—Industrial News Bureau.

Bradford, Weeden & Co., the well-known local investment bankers, announce the change of their corporate name to Bradford, Kimball & Co., effective April 16th. This change now includes in the firm style the name of Mr. Sherman Kimball, who has been identified with the bond business on the Pacific Coast for many years and who was one of the original members of the corporation. Mr. Kimball is in charge of the buying and underwriting department of the company.

It is almost time to call a halt on scare articles about the depletion of oil reserves in the United States. The wrong method is being adopted for directing attention to the necessity of conserving our resources and ceasing to act as though Nature's fecundity in this respect will last forever. Those to whom the headlines are addressed are beginning to think that there is some ulterior motive behind the apparent "drive," says the Review, published by Strassburger & Co.

It is a safe rule to read the figures of experts carefully, and do one's best to unravel the geological problems presented by them (not forgetting that historians have always had the last word in the controversies of the past), but to make one's own deductions. The mentality of the scientific mind insures a technically truthful presentation of the facts of the case dealt with, but when the lesson to be learned from them is given, the less attention paid the better. Contrary to general opinion, the expert sees only what he wishes to see, though compelled to present the whole picture.

Domestic production and imports, consumption and exports, are the factors of immediate concern. The increased production of the United States during the last three years shows signs of slowing down, imports (when not artificially curtailed) have been increasing, exports during the same period have not changed materially. With the exception of ten months, stocks have increased monthly over the same period. Domestic consumption has nearly doubled.

The months-supply in storage over the last four years has varied between the figures 3 and 7½, the average being about 5. It can not be said that there has at any time been too much oil in sight, when we consider the relation between our production and that of the rest of the world, and, of course, the hitherto demands of industry. The ratio between the oil in sight and consumption has, during the same period, been reflected with remarkable accuracy in the oil price, though the two curves have not always moved together.

The importance of Mexican production may be exaggerated in some quarters, but it controls the situation at present. Since the beginning of 1917 the deficiency in the amount of oil produced in this country to meet the demands of consumption and export has increased from about 2,000,000 barrels to 7,210,000 barrels. There have even been months in which consumption (counting exports) has exceeded domestic production plus imports.

Stephens & Co. have completed arrangements for moving their offices from their former quarters in the Merchants' National Bank Building to the new building recently erected for them at 65 Sutter Street, where they will occupy much larger quarters, giving increased facilities and personnel.

This step, taken by one of the oldest California investment houses, with offices in Los Angeles, San Diego, San Francisco, and Oakland, is simply another indication of the extent to which the California market is developing.

The Freeman, Smith & Camp Company are offering $200,000 Sanitary District No. 1, Marin County, California, gold 6 per cent. bonds to yield 5.25 per cent., tax exempt. This district of Marin County comprises about twenty-four square miles of the most valuable and best improved portion of the county. It includes the cities of Ross, San Anselmo, Kentfield, Fairfax, Manor, Yolanda, Lansdale, Pacheco, and the surrounding territory. Because of its favorable location and natural advantages, the territory within the district has become one of the most popular suburbs of San Francisco. Frequent transportation is provided by the electric lines of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad. Marin County has an assessed valuation of $24,662,673 with no debt. Incorporated cities within the district have a total net debt of $148,900.

of the National City Bank of New York, has been one of the striking features of the commercial changes during and since the war. Our total trade with Egypt in the year preceding the war but about $17,000,000; in the closing year of the war it was $35,000,000, in 1919 it advanced to $55,000,000, and in 1920 totaled $135,000,000. With the general reduction which characterized world international trade in 1921 and the sharp fall off in purchasing power of that country by reason of the low prices of its cotton the total of our trade with Egypt fell to $36,000,000, but was still more than double that in 1913 or in any year prior to the war.

This growth in our trade with Egypt has been especially striking in the matter of merchandise exported to that country. Prior to the war our exports to Egypt seldom exceeded $2,000,000, and in many years were far less than that sum. In 1915 they advanced to $5,000,000 and in 1916 were over $14,000,000, dropping off in 1917 and 1918 by reason of transportation difficulties, but again advancing to $15,000,000 in 1919, and $38,000,000 in 1920.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

There has been quite an outburst of French fiction into English translation and American publication recently. Nor has the manifestation been by any means local to one or two publishers. To enumerate, there is the great peasant novel "Nène," by Ernest Perochon, the rural schoolteacher, who was bombed out of obscurity by the publication of his novel and its subsequent winning of the Prix Goncourt in 1920. "Nène" has just reached

American readers in the form of a translation published by the George H. Doran Company. Then there is the other great popular favorite of the French, "Salt Lake," by Pierre Benoit. This is a rather remarkable story of Salt Lake City in the days of Brigham Young. The translation that reaches America is issued by Alfred A. Knopf. A third effervescence of French fiction into English, via this time the publication of G. P. Putnam's Sons, is "The Illusion," by Raymond Escholier, which in its original form under the title "Dansons la Trompeuse" won the Lady Northcliffe prize for the most important French fiction of its year. It is "The Illusion" that we wish especially to consider now.

M. Escholier has taken a theme that is singularly unhackneyed, despite the fact—or because of it—that it lies within everyday experience. "The Illusion" is not a story; it is a portrait of an elderly belle, the pathetic figure of a beauty, defying age. When Therese Lestelle was a girl her coming was "as if some one had thrown an armful of sweet briar on the fire." Alas that the old age of such an exquisite creature could not be equally charming. Mme. Lestelle, the widow of later years and uncertain age, frizzed her dyed hair and painted her face. She was the centre of innocent gossip—for her sins ceased with her artifice of appearance—in the pastoral region of provincial France of which "The Illusion" gives so clear and fresh a picture. It is regrettable but true that one can not imagine an English-writing novelist dealing with this trite idea with the ease and poetry of M. Escholier. He, the imaginary English or American writer, would almost surely have stressed his satire to breaking point. M. Escholier treats it as the delicate tragedy that it is, faintly, but oh so faintly, touched with irony.

Quite one of the most noteworthy novels of recent times is "The Longest Journey," by E. M. Forster (Alfred A. Knopf). Forster is said to be admired by the cognoscenti of England and to be as yet undiscovered by America. It will be strange if he does not spring into speedy recognition here when "The Longest Journey" is read. We are not sure that this is a great book, but it is indubitably a real one, and perhaps that is, after all, a definition of a great one. Rickie Elliot's life story is very real without being at all commonplace. It is hard to find the exact and more than golden mean between the two in a novel—whether you are reading it or writing it. I don't know whether any novelist deliberately puts his idea on the scales that measure ordinariness and its lack, but many a one might profit by doing so. If his characters are hyperbolic and paragonic, the all-too-ordinary reader loses interest in them. One might as well read Greek mythology. But the antidote is not simply to shun perfection. It is in some queer way to shun both the poles of perfection, the equator of the emotions, and yet eschew the temperate zone of ordinariness. It must be really very hard to write a good novel, and we give full credit to Mr. Forster for having done so. Like so many significant English novels, "The Longest Journey" is biographical. It is all very well for the French to pick and choose, to compose, and to give one facet of the whole. But it seems to suit the English temperament to be biographical. It is because we are less interested in art and more engrossed in reality. "The Illusion," discussed above, deals with realities—as seen by a poet. "The Longest Journey" deals with realities as seen by any Englishman who might have known Rickie throughout his brief, disastrous life. The French are not fond of realism per se, but only as a contrast or protest to drab ordinariness. Perhaps for all their art they have never learnt the art of balancing between our two extremes. But they are masters in evading it by the illusion of beauty. One enjoys "The Illusion" as one enjoys a pastel; one reads it for its loveliness. Commonly told, it would be nothing. Very different is the Anglo-Saxon standard of merit. No degree of ordinary writing could spoil the thematic interest of "The Longest Journey." Mr. Forster's theme is really notable—though not unheard of. It is that people are to be classified by their temperaments rather than by minds, manners, or still more concrete personalia. Rickie, with only an ordinary mind and indifferent talent, was cursed with a philosophic, "clever" temperament. He was condemned to live with his materialistic, unimaginative wife and brother-in-law. That is the whole of his story, but Mr. Forster has treated it admirably. It is an immense relief to find so human a novel so free of sex-complexes. To the average civilized life, even as to Rickie's and Ansell's, sex is an incident. In fact civilization means the conquest of sex, and yet the average novel is permeated and dominated by sex. Again we thank Mr. Forster for his sane stand. The real things of life are, according to Mr. Forster, and we heartily agree, the things of the mind. It is comparatively unimportant—we are again quoting our author indirectly and approvingly—whether you are happy or unhappy in love or whether you ever are in love. It is devilishly important that you live your own life, think your own thoughts, act according to your own conscience, and, to use the proverbial expression, own your own soul. All that is the theme of "The Longest Journey," one of the sincerest, most interesting, and most vital novels we have read of late.

On a somewhat cognate idea "Lilia Chenoworth," by Lee Wilson Dodd, a recent publication of the Duttons, is based. But the temperament that plays havoc with the characters of "Lilia Chenoworth" is the familiar artistic one. According to Mr. Dodd, people either have it or haven't it, and one can not mix the sheep and the goats. To hark back to "The Longest Journey," its path is never crossed by the artistic temperament. Its burden is the dozen other varieties that make for human incompatibility. Like many other current novels, the latter half of "Lilia Chenoworth" far excels the first. It must be that the modern novelist's temperament, to mention still another variety, is impatient of craftsmanship and of rewriting. His work gradually gets better and he leaves the finished (!) product as it stands, weak beginning, mediocre middle, and quite excellent end. Whether or not this can be adopted as a generalization, it is true of "Lilia Chenoworth," which is a very uneven piece of work and would be a very fine one if it were all equal to its best. It sounds like a conundrum, and indeed some parts of our story remind us of one. It is far from being a homogeneous whole; and though it may be argued that so is life, we are just disagreeable enough to add that the heterogeneous quality of "Lilia Chenoworth" does not for us match colors with the kaleidoscope of life. However, we think that Mr. Dodd has a very remarkable talent—his descriptive vein is very fine and his characters are vital—and that if he once acquires the habit of careful workmanship he will produce very big things in deed. In "Lilia Chenoworth" the viewpoint shifts too distressingly and the key in which the book should be written is not sustained throughout. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Chief among the Yale University Press books of the season are Aimée Dostoyevsky's study of her father, the Russian novelist; Dean Roscoe Pound's "An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law"; Chief Justice William Howard Taft's "Liberty Under Law," and "Poems from the Yale Record."

Elizabeth Kemper Adams, whose recent book, "Women Professional Workers," was published by the Macmillan Company, is the instructor of the Columbia University extension course on professional occupations. She was for years professor of education at Smith College.

Miss Maude Royden, who is one of the personalities selected by "A Gentleman with a Duster" in "Painted Windows," is soon to come to America to address an international conference of the Y. W. C. A. Miss Royden is the author of "Sex and Character," shortly to be published by the Putnams.

Gunnar Gunnarsson, whose novel, "Guest the One-Eyed," has just been published by Knopf, is an Icelander. He learned Danish in order to compass a larger audience, and when it is remembered that Icelandic is as different from Danish as Latin is from French, and that very few Danes learn Icelandic, and that Icelanders find great difficulty in the guttural Danish, Gunnarsson's feat is invariably compared to Conrad's. "Guest the One-Eyed" is an epic work, originally published in Danish in four separate volumes. It is said to be similar to "The Wandering Jew" in its central figures of a repentant sinner. The scene is Iceland, and the primitive life of the Icelandic people today is depicted.

Cassius J. Keyser, whose book on mathematical philosophy was recently published by the Duttons, has had a typically American career. He was born during the civil war in a log cabin on a farm in Ohio. His early contact with nature revealed the essential beauties of the heavens and the earth and inspired him to search for knowledge. It led him to the University of Missouri, to the University of Michigan, where he studied law, and to Columbia University. He deserted the law, however, chose mathematics as his specialty, and adopted the law as his profession. He has been for some years Adrain professor of mathematics at Columbia. "Mathematical Philosophy," his new book, is intended, not only for mathematicians, but for educated men and women of every kind of interest.

S. B. H. Hurst, sailor-author and creator of "Coomer Ali," intends to write a book which he will call "Remarkable Characters of the Persian Gulf." However, he says he will not dare call it anything but fiction, so improbable is the nature of his material. Mr. Hurst tells of a one-eyed African who told him there is hidden in Kism a perfect pearl, large as a man's head. The one-eyed one had been the leader of a gang of pearl pirates. Mr. Hurst is at present at work on a new novel which Harpers will publish.

"Mount Everest: The Reconnaissance, 1921," by Lieutenant-Colonel Howard-Bury and other members of the expedition, is to be published this spring by the English house, Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. In addition to a history of the expedition, there is an outline of the preparations for the attempt this season. The geology, survey, and fauna and flora of the region are also dealt with. The volume is illustrated from the finest of the series of photographs which were exhibited at the Alpine Club's Hall in London.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

David, the Son of Jesse.

An unusual departure from the stereotyped historical novel is that of Marjorie Strachey in her new work, "David, the Son of Jesse." A novel of biblical times is apt to have a rather small audience. There is, after all, only a limited class of readers who like historical fiction, and biblical fiction seems even more formidable. But so modern is Miss Strachey's novel, so potent is the Strachey method of infusing life into documents, that "David, the Son of Jesse," becomes drama of the most arresting sort. Not that the action is anywhere keyed up. The author gets her effect rather from a matter-of-fact handling and complete absence of the factitious note of "reconstruction." One is not bored by the latter element, so common to the historical novel, and so distressing to the critical taste of any one who wants art to conceal art. Miss Strachey's art and her research, which must have been laborious, are entirely concealed. The effect is that of sheer drama, spiced with the pungent air of biblical grandeur.

The Latest Thing.

"The Latest Thing and Other Things," by Alexander Black, is a collection of amusing papers, whose merit lies rather in their momentary titillation than in depth of thought or opinion. Mr. Black has a joyous facility of phrase, and one reads paper after paper in a sort of happy hypnotism, enchanted by style. It is somewhat disconcerting upon finishing to find out that you hardly know what he has been talking about, but whatever it was, he talked brilliantly. It is the sort of thing that—overheard at a gathering of the wits—one would label clever talk or "good" talk. We suspect Mr. Black of being, like another great wit of paradox fame, rather a victim of his too easily ridden pen. Nevertheless "The Latest Thing" makes very good reading, particularly of the sort guaranteed to enliven a dull train ride or to bridge an insomniac night.

Free Range Lanning.

A Wild West story that has some of the freshness formerly associated with the regions of the Rockies is "Free Range Lanning," by George Owen Baxter. It has the usual love theme running through it and the characters are the usual strong wild men, some good, mostly bad, and a beautiful girl. Its difference from the too conventionalized tale of the woolly West lies in a certain sincerity of tone and vitality of action. As Western novels go it is unusual.

FREE RANGE LANNING. By George Owen Baxter. New York: Chelsea House; $1.75.

The Bracegirdle.

"The Bracegirdle" is a novel of England in the days of William of Orange, the principal character being that of Anne Bracegirdle, idol of the London stage and toast of English coffee-houses. The story of Anne's hazardous affairs is adventurous enough to suit the most active taste; and hers and Lovell's affair is plentifully enlivened with the dashing history of the times. Though not a serious historical novel, "The Bracegirdle" supplied a vivid picture of seventeenth-century England, and Anne's story is indubitably based on fact. She was a player at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane and was comonly called "The Diana of the English Stage." Occasional glimpses of the great characters of the day aid in the historical illusion—Dryden, Congreve, Halifax, and the king himself appear. The attempt to restore the dialect of the seventeenth century is conscientious, but perhaps unhappy. Many readers find a strange dialect trying to read even when it is as perfectly comprehensible as in the present case. Historical novelists, like translators, should find a golden mean between literal transcribing and too thorough modernizing or domesticizing their idiom.

Saint-Saëns

Admirers of Camille Saint-Saëns and music lovers generally will welcome an adequate little handbook on the great French composer by Arthur Hervey, author of "French Music in the XIX Century" and "Masters of French Music." As the nature of these studies implies, Mr. Hervey is peculiarly well fitted to write of Saint-Saëns, and he does so with the greatest sympathy. If he occasionally waxes enthusiastic, it is no more than any Saint-Saëns disciple would do in his place.

Without attempting to be biographical in the scientific sense, the author supplies a résumé of the facts of Saint-Saëns' life, followed by a more special study of his musical career. The third division of the book is a critical study of Saint-Saëns' literary activities. Like so many geniuses his talent was of a universal nature not limited to one form of expression. The book concludes with a list of musical compositions and a Saint-Saëns bibliography.

The Wisdom of the Beasts.

Charles Augustus Strong, Columbia professor of psychology, has rendered his philosophy in a popular form, called "The Wisdom of the Beasts"—a book of modern fables. In his brief but truly illuminating sketches here, Professor Strong hits off the prevalent schools of philosophy, pragmatism, monism, neo-realism, Bergson's vitalism, and Einstein's relativity. Professor Strong writes with the simplicity of true fabular style and his beasts converse more divertingly than do the human characters in most fiction. "The Wisdom of the Beasts" is piquant, amusing, and thoughtful.

Watched by Wild Animals.

Not the least of the features of "Watched by Wild Animals," the new Enos A. Mills nature book, is the extreme clearness of the illustrations, themselves a liberal education in Rocky Mountain animal life, but Mr. Mills' latest would be a good animal book if it had no illustrations at all. He is an enthusiastic nature lover and particularly an animal enthusiast, and he writes for his own kind; but it would be hard to imagine the most indifferent reader coming away entirely unimpressed by "Watched by Wild Animals." Mr. Mills is an excellent writer as well as a trained observer of animal antics.

The Divine Comedy

One's first impression of Mr. Anderson's translation of Dante's Comedy is of the handsome format of the book, its clear print, fine paper, and proportions. As befits so onerous a production, it is distinctly a library edition, made to be read and to endure and meanwhile to be good library furniture.

Mr. Anderson has accomplished a tour de force in his translation. He attempted and achieved what has hitherto been considered impossible—a line-for-line translation in the triple rime of the original. But not only has the translator been faithful to the text—he has made of it great English poetry. The present translation of "The Divine Comedy" should be welcome to all students of literature and to every one unable to read Dante in the original. The book is illustrated with Florentine coats-of-arms and is furnished with marginal notes.

Handbook of Municipal Government.

A "Handbook of Municipal Government," by Charles M. Fassett, a former mayor of Spokane, is not of the theoretic type of civic books. Mr. Fassett has had practical experience in city managing and his handbook is a working hypothesis rather than a theory. The present volume is a treatise of various forms of government which have been actually put in practice and found successful. The handbook takes up by turns the borough, the town meeting, the federal type of government, the mayor-council type, the responsible executive, the commission form, and the city manager. American cities today are undergoing many changes in their types of government; and the present volume is a timely contribution to civic literature and guide to civic government.

Women Rivals of H. G. Wells.

Today a great number of Englishwomen are reading history at the universities, teaching it when qualified and many devoting themselves to the fascinations of research.

It has been said that as a rule women have little historical sense, but this winter many books by Englishwomen on historical subjects have been published, and one is considered by many to be the greatest authority on monastic history.

"At least six women historians have made such reputations for themselves that their fame will last for generations," says the secretary of the Royal Historical Society.

It seems that the war is mainly responsible for this new outlet for women. The upheaval in Europe made many women want to look back into the story of Europe and so they took up historical research and some became members of the Royal Historical Society, though the standard of fellowship is exacting.

The population of Java is about seven times that of Australia, although the island is only about 600 miles long and 250 miles wide. Its tea estates and factories and buildings erected thereon are much better and cleaner and more modern than those of Ceylon and India. The sugar industry is run on the best and most scientific lines, although the output is not so large as Cuba's. The rubber industry is rapidly approaching the high standard reached in the Federated Malay States. The government telephone system is infinitely better than those in Singapore, Colombo, and Sydney, and compares very favorably with that of London and New York.

The English Channel was crossed by a balloon in 1785.

PORTOLA WOODS

A Spring Valley Subdivision

In the desirable Woodside district of San Mateo County is the country-home acreage known as Portola Woods. It adjoins the Family Farm and the properties of Stanford University, being situated less than five miles from the University buildings.

Here are thickets and open spaces, hills and hollows, with a wealth of oaks, redwoods and other trees, the whole so subdivided as to give each parcel the charm of scenic variety.

Bear Gulch Creek flows through the property to join San Francisco Creek.

Water is piped to every lot, the roads are good, there are here combined the advantages of rustic seclusion and accessibility.

Home-sites vary in size from 8 to 39 acres. For the parcels that remain unsold prices per acre range from $450 to $650—lower than prevailing prices for similar property in that region. These prices are particularly attractive compared with prices of city lots.

The high-class improvements on the parcels already sold stamp the countryside so unmistakably that this subdivision can not fail to appeal to the most discriminating seeker after the ideal country-home site.

"THE SORCERER."

A particularly striking investiture of "The Sorcerer," the predominating colors being black and mellow maize yellow, is giving the Players Theatre a handsome appearance this week. One set does for the two acts, and the very chic costumes for the large chorus are made of the same colors.

"The Sorcerer," while it does not stand in the same rank as the well-known Gilbert and Sullivan favorites, is more fertile in melodies and, perhaps, less labored in humor than "Ruddigore." Its central idea is really better; that of love-philandering an entire village, in order that an infatuated and happily betrothed young man may enable all around him to share in the love bliss which pervades his being.

Of course, as in "Midsummer Night's Dream," everything goes to sixes and sevens, peers mate with pew-openers, and constant hearts are made temporarily inconstant until the mischief is finally and happily remedied.

In order fitly to present these musical pieces a call is made on the talented personnel of the company that can both sing and act. To give an idea of the opportunity that an attraction of this kind affords to the membership of the Players Club it may be mentioned that with the alternates and the chorus there are fifty members who will appear before the public, during the April and May run of the piece, forty-two of them being on the stage at each representation. There are alternates in all but two of the eight important rôles, one of the actors appearing before the curtain at each performance to state which ones appear on that special occasion.

Constant appearances before the public are changing the status of some of these young people from that of amateurs to professionals. As a result of their comparatively considerable experience Marguerite Fry Silvey, Ruth Scott Laidlaw, Atha A. Hillbaek, Jane Parent, Baldwin McGaw, Nelson McGee, Frederick McNulty, S. Ralph Kellner, and George H. Hooke played with the aplomb of veterans. There was, indeed, such a high polish on the performance that a stranger present, unaware of the conditions in the club and the status of the players, would not for a moment have regarded it as a performance by amateurs; which is more than one could say of many performances that we have seen here by alleged professionals.

Perhaps the most strikingly finished performance in respect to élan, a spirit of burlesque, appropriateness of gesture and pose, and mental ebullience was that of Baldwin McGaw in the rôle of the sorcerer. Mr. McGaw has not been hitherto numbered among the singers of the Players, but a pleasant singing voice and extreme dramatic intelligence enabled the young player to cover the singing part of his rôle most acceptably.

The spectacular voice of the troupe is possessed by Marguerite Fry Silvey, the young lady in the leading soprano rôle of Aline. Miss Silvey's voice does not show up so well in the plain, workaday passages of her rôle, but when it strikes the decorative parts it loses its unevenness, becomes more full, round, and assured, and shows very considerable reserves of silver-toned volume. The young lady acts with ease and assurance, but she lapses every now and then into an in-elegance of accent that shows the need of mending her fences in that respect; a reproach that can be leveled against no others of the present cast.

Atha A. Hillbaek also sang well and acted with ease, and Ruth Scott Laidlaw made up to be a charmingly pretty and aristocratic old lady in the rôle of Lady Sangazure, making a hit with her pleasingly melodious rendering of the interpolated Arthur Sullivan love lyric, "Once Again."

Nelson McGee made a fine appearance in the graceful costume of Alexis, and sang the part in a voice of satisfying volume and range, Frederick McNulty gave a notably good burlesque representation of the old vicar, Jane Parent put the stage peasant flavor into the character of the buxom pew-opener, S. Ralph Kellner showed professional poise as Sir Marmaduke, and George H. Hooke was full-voiced and unctuous as the notary.

The deficiency in the general representation was due to the lack of a full-sized brand of Gilbertian fun in the opera. It takes very talented comedians to develop the humor in rôles rather slenderly equipped therewith, and it seems that when "The Sorcerer" had its first London representation nearly five decades ago George Grossmith began with the rôle of John Wellington Wells, the sorcerer of the piece, his great success in the long roll of Gilbertian characters which made his name well known on both sides of the Atlantic.

A peculiarly dry and restrained humor, so say the annals of the times, enabled "Gee Gee" to develop the Gilbertian humor to its fullest. So that Grossmith was a very important factor in elevating "The Sorcerer" to the public favor it subsequently enjoyed.

But in this piece we see neither of the famous partners at their greatest. Only it is most interesting to trace, in these revivals of the less well-known Gilbert and Sullivan pieces, the coming of that sureness of touch which was subsequently to bring world-wide fame to the gifted pair.

"PINAFORE."

The singers at the Columbia are giving lots of pleasure this week to audiences with their revival of "Pinafore." There have, of course, been many revivals of this opera that "a-many years ago" was the lively forerunner of the long line of Gilbert and Sullivan opera burlesques. But these pieces remain eternally young and fresh and humorous; their melodic charm is unimpaired, their travesty of the grandiose solemnities of opera make you chuckle anew each time, and sad indeed is that spectator who can not laugh until his side aches over the antics of Gilbert's primest clowns.

True, Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B., is not one of the funniest of these, ridiculous and smile-provoking though the sentimental old duffer is. But the opera as a whole is a delightful travesty, and one that is felt and appreciated all the more just after seeing the sentimental inanities of "The Bohemian Girl." For, logically, "The Bohemian Girl" is just the sort of thing Gilbert was travestying.

It is difficult to write about "Pinafore" without becoming reminiscent. "Do you remember how all the church choirs formed themselves into 'Pinafore' companies when the 'Pinafore' epidemic hit the country?" "Yes; and even children's companies toured the circuits." "And what a lovely Josephine!"—but there! we must restrain ourselves. "Pinafore" has been reminisced to death.

At present young America has taken it in hand. The youth and freshness of the Dunbar singers' voices tell delightfully in the opera. The old choruses seem as fresh as the carolings of this spring's song-birds, and the simplicity of the delicious melodies makes them so singable that the young company render them with the style of well-trained vocalists. Theo Pennington's voice was lovely in Josephine's lyrics; it is a sin to force so strong and true an organ, as she occasionally and most unnecessarily does. Paula Ayres was an excellent Buttercup, and as, in the past, we have been befuddled with many Buttercups who were no singers, it was a great pleasure to witness the rôle so well sung and acted.

Ed Andrews, of course, was the Sir Joseph of tradition; a polite old Philistine, very insistent in his good manners, the lines spoken admirably by this experienced comedian; too experienced to let himself lapse into the mechanical tone of the bored tyro going for the five-hundredth time over a too well-known part.

Carl Bundschu, who has an Irish twinkle in his eye, in spite of his German name, did well with the rôle of the Captain. Harry Pfeil, whose elastic mouth has a constitutional tendency to smile, was properly solemn as the romantically oppressed Rafe, and poured his ample tenor out in lyric waves of delightful melody.

The choruses were most enjoyable, and if you don't mind a certain naïveté in the personality of the soprano, the tenor, and the smaller fry of the company, and if you don't know the opera too, too well, you can derive a very great deal of pleasure from the performance.

GRANDEST GRAND OPERA.

This opera game is no joke, and I shouldn't wonder if the local guarantors, and the heads of the Chicago Grand Opera organization are feeling rather rueful these times. For to those heads San Francisco may prove the goose that laid the golden egg.

The Chicago Grand Opera organization ought to be hardened to losses, for its financial affairs are not conservatively handled, and it has lost terrifically in Chicago and New York. Out here on its Western tour it did well only in Portland, Oregon.

About San Francisco, its success a year ago made it too hopeful. In the interim the Scotti troupe, with singers from the Metropolitan, had carried off a wad of operatic shekels, and it was too soon for a community that has not a densely settled section back of it to have another season of seven-and-a-half-dollar-a-seat opera. We were already drained pretty dry, and it ought to have been a full year before we were again treated to grandest grand opera. Besides, the Chicago operatic organization ought to have recalled past history. In 1913, under the prudent management of Doctor Leahy it had a financially successful season at the Tivoli. In 1914 it came again, but it broke away from the management of the tried and proved local man, and lost money.

The mistake this time was in coming so soon. It is also felt that it was insufficiently provided with leading singers. Out here we, in our innocent Californian way, want to roll our tongues over a number of big names and say, "I heard so-and-so, and so-and-so, and so-and-so." Whereas we were obliged to say, "Yes, I heard Raisa and Johnson in this, and that, and the other."

And there's another point: the public has learned all the dips, spurs, and angles of the Exposition Auditorium. True, this ugly, lead-colored monstrosity—I speak of the interior, but certainly the exterior is nothing to boast of—that ought to have been a beautiful amphitheatre has served us some good turns. Its possibilities were first discovered when John McCormack used it for his Red Cross benefit concert. Then Frank Healy hired it for the two Galli-Curci recitals, and the thousands that assembled within it drew nation-wide attention to its possibilities; for it was practically filled at both recitals.

Profiting by this success, Mr. Healy hired it for the Scotti Grand Opera troupe. They only stayed a week, but the cautious financial policy followed resulted in pecuniary success. After that the Chicago Grand Opera organization sat up and took notice, and then began the see-saw between the two operatic organizations, which resulted in our having grandest grand opera four times in two years.

No one need feel that reproaches can be leveled against San Francisco for the pecuniary losses suffered by the Chicago people; for, here on the verge of the Pacific Ocean, with a comparatively slenderly populated farming district back of it, our city has poured out half a million dollars all told for the San Francisco Symphony Association, has supported several in-between minor operatic seasons during the after-war years, has twice sent the Scotti troupe away rejoicing, has liberally patronized the recitals of famous artists, sent the Chicago Grand Opera people away a year ago with their wallets well stuffed, and has simply been called on too soon and too often to keep up its operatic record.

No, there has been a lack of judgment somewhere, but not here. San Franciscans, as I say, have learned the Exposition Auditorium by heart, and I doubt if anything as spectacular as grand opera will fill it again. Recitals may, free blows will, but people want to see the spectacle at grand opera, and acres of the side seats are anathema to our perspicacious opera lovers, who regard opera as something to be seen as well as heard.

THE ORPHEUM.

That old yarn about the Roman cherub that died from being gilded all over his bare skin to make a papal holiday seems to be discredited, for they are doing that sort of thing nowadays, and we can see an instance of it this week in the Rinaldo Brothers' "Roman Art" act at the Orpheum. It makes them look, by turns, as the lights change, like silver, gold, or bronze statues, but on the whole the marbling effect is more beautiful. The Rinaldo Brothers give a fine act in balancing, strong-man feats, and statuesque poses.

There are two dancing acts, Berk and Sawm's being more in the nature of a fill-in, in spite of the nimbleness of the pair and their handsome setting. But the girl is a tyro in singing and couldn't seem to get her stuff over. The William Seabury act is quite an elaborate affair, with a number of handsome sets and striking costumes to set off a gorgeous Oriental interlude. Four girls do a lot of excellent dancing, figuring as bare-legged odalisques in a highly decorative dream born in the brain of the blonde young traveler who goes to sleep in a Pullman. This is William Seabury, who is no slouch of a dancer himself, although he good-naturedly recognized that the enthusiasm of the audience was particularly aroused by his troupe of pretty and skillful girl dancers.

There is ample variety on the bill this week, Sandy Shaw giving a Harry Lauderish act in kilts with a Scotch accent that you could chop off in chunks. The accent and the costume and the voice are all right, but the performer is devoid of the genial humor necessary for an act of this kind.

"Wire Collect" is a sentimental little comedy of the sort audiences like; just a man and a girl falling in love to the accompaniment of American jests. Clarence Oliver does his part well, the girl only fairly, and her speaking voice is badly in need of being licked into shape.

An exotic touch—or an attempt at it—is supplied by the presence of Princess Jue Quon Tai, a Chinese young lady who claims to speak English with an accent picked up in her native China. But you can't fool us, Quon Tai dear. When you branch out in speech of any length we recognize the Americanized speech that we hear from the youths and maidens in the Chinatown shops. For some reason—their thoroughness, I suppose—the public-school-educated Chinese pick up the worst and most distressing brand of hard-English—or American, rather, for the English would run a mile from the Kansas City brand of their native speech—and that is the kind that we hear coming anomalously from the almond-eyed youth in Chinatown.

Jue Quon Tai's act is not particularly interesting because of her pretense of speaking English with an accent—very badly assumed—and because she seems to feel it necessary to dish up in her songs with an air of surprised innocence all the numerous improprieties and extravagances that Miss America is guilty of during the present epoch; and because her voice is too throaty; and because the act had a decidedly amateurish flavor.

So we parted from her without regret, but in a subsequent act in which she appeared, borrowed by Jim Corbett to help him out, she looked twice as pretty, several degrees younger and slenderer, and was very cute in her dainty disdain of the tippler whose attentions were supposed to offend her aristocratic sensibilities.

The best thing on the bill is that of Billy B. Van and James J. Corbett in an immensely funny patter act called "The Eighteenth Amendment."

In this act Jim Corbett, turned out most irreproachably in a sport suit that would make a dyed-in-the-wool dude ache with envy, served as a sort of feeder to Billy Van, who had all the fat lines, the jokes, the ridiculousness, while the stately Jim drew him out, admonished him, and occasionally thumped him into good behavior.

It was really a very good idea. Corbett is popular, therefore his presence was liked; but in his comfortable, liberal-minded way he is perfectly aware that he can only feed. He knows that any jokes he might fire at the house would share in the rigid, well-creased perfection of his trousers, the perfect cut of his coat, the fit of his latest-agoony sport shoes; but he couldn't make them go. So Billy does the going. He makes everything skate along on wheels, puts whalebone into the jokes, extemporizes not a few himself—he must, they pop out so spontaneously—and keeps the laughter at high pressure. His material is very good, and he himself is a born fun-maker.

It really was an edifying and interesting sight to see the tall ex-pugilist placidly sacrificing his self-importance for the good of the act.

The bill closed with a trained dog act in which half a dozen beautiful collies showed off their talents with comparative willingness.

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

Chauncey Olcott, supported by a New York cast and augmented orchestra, will begin a two-weeks engagement at the Columbia Theatre Monday, April 17th, in the three-act idyl of Irish romance, "Ragged Robin," by Rida Johnson Young and Rita Olcott. It is an Irish fairy play of the days when the simple folk believed in the "good little people." Reviewers say that with its elements of fantasy and Celtic folk-lore "Ragged Robin" is unquestionably the best vehicle in which this noted actor has ever appeared. Mr. Olcott's song repertoire for this engagement includes "Sweet Girl of My Dreams," "Each Day Till I Die," "In Dublin's Fair City," "I Used to Believe in Fairies," "The Click of Her Little Brogans," and "When." Though Irish in sentiment, their heart interest and tunefulness will appeal, for they are the kind the audience hums as the curtain rings down on the last act.

Henry Miller Coming.

Henry Miller's organization, to open at the Columbia Theatre two weeks hence, will include, besides the actor-manager, Blanche Bates, Ruth Chatterton, Bruce McRae, and other notable players. Miller has secured a new play from the pens of A. E. Thomas and Harrison Rhodes, entitled "Her Friend the King." The play is based on the novel by Harrison Rhodes called "High Life." Besides those already mentioned, the company will include Geoffrey Kerr, who scored a triumph in the Miller production of "Just Suppose," Mary Carroll, Marguerite St. John, Bert Leigh, A. G. Andrews, and Elmer Brown.

The Kreisler Concert.

Some fifteen years ago a handful of music lovers sat in a small hall in San Francisco to hear a violin recital by the then comparatively unknown Fritz Kreisler. Most of these auditors had heard all the other violinists of those times and they were eager to see if the mild-mannered fellow before them would equal the best efforts of his competitors. The general verdict was that he had surpassed them in technique, interpretation, quality of tone, and skill in bowing, and that none had quite approached him in the matter of style, and ability to reach the hearts of his auditors. Kreisler's admirers in San Francisco have so increased since those first appearances of fifteen years ago that next Sunday afternoon at the Exposition Auditorium he will face the largest audience that ever attended a violin recital anywhere. People are coming from as far north as Chico, as far east as Ogden, Utah, and every point in California will be represented by music lovers. The concert will commence promptly at 2:30.

"Wild Birds" on the Way.

The Greek Theatre Players will be seen for the first time in San Francisco during the week of April 10th in a production of "Wild Birds," by Dan Totheroh, which won the $300 prize offered in 1921 by the Greek Theatre for the best play by a Californian author. Future performances will be given at the Players Club on April 18th and 19th, 25th and 26th. Totheroh's play has aroused much comment since its first production by the Greek Theatre Players in Berkeley a month ago. His work is already known to San Francisco through the Players Club productions of several one-act plays and a three-act drama, "The Exiles."

The Orpheum Next Week.

Josephine Victor is the headliner on the coming week's bill. Miss Victor will be seen here in a romance, "Juliet and Romeo," by Harry Wagstaff Gribble. Miss Victor made her Broadway debut in 1907 in a leading rôle in "The Secret Orchard," by Channing Pollock. Since then she has added to her fame by appearances with Wilton Lackaye in "The Battle," Tom Jefferson in "The Other Fellow," and in scores of other successes. Last season she created the principal rôle in Galsworthy's "The Skin Game." She is supported by a capable company of players in her current offering.

There may be different opinions as to the perfect woman. There is, however, no question that Dainty Marie's figure approaches closely to perfection.

Lynn and Smith throw their talkology into high gear, resulting in a racey conversation. Their speed is laughter, and all through the act the speedometer records that they are exceeding the speed limit. Basil Lynn was late of Toombes and Lynn, and with his new partner an association is formed that proves an exceedingly happy one.

One must be versatile to offer variety and James Silver, Helen Duval, and George Kirby are versatile, therefore their comedy variety skit is a laugh of this and a laugh of that tied together in such a capable way that the knots don't show. They call their little package of mirth "The Star Boarder."

Bert Howard, author, composer, comedian, and pianist extraordinary, is here again, this time with a new offering consisting of a repertoire of songs, smart patter, and piano playing, which he bills under the modest title of "The Man with the Piano."

When Alex Patty was a boy his mother, like most mothers, in reply to innumerable queries, admonished him to use his head, and Alex Patty must have taken his mother literally, because he not only uses his head to think with, but also to walk with and for many phenomenal feats. Patty is known as the upside down genius and his work entitles him to the title.

A laugh, a tune, a step, pep, looks, ability. This is a brief summary of "Even As You and I," offered by Ford and Cunningham. George Ford is a comedian with original methods and Flo Cunningham is both pleasing to the eye and ear. The little skit was written by Blair Treynor. If it is amusement you want Ford and Cunningham can give it to you.

William Seabury and his excellent company in their intimate revue are the only hold-overs, and their's is an act that can be enjoyed a second time even more than at first showing.

THE CHURCH AND THE MOUNTAINS.

Now that Cardinal Ratti has become Pope Pius XI the world is learning how distinguished he was in many fields as a priest of the church (says the New York Times). Nothing in his career excites more interest than his proficiency in manly sports, particularly the skill and daring he displayed as a mountain climber. There should be no astonishment that a priest has excelled as an Alpinist. Cardinal Ratti had an illustrious predecessor in Father Placidus, who was born at Truns in 1782. He, too, was a scholar, as much at home in his library as in the mountain passes, where from an early age he tended his father's flocks. When Father Placidus was past seventy he continued to climb. He made first ascents of the Stockhorn (11,411 feet) in 1788, the Rheinwaldhorn (11,148 feet) in 1789, the Piz Urlaun (11,063 feet) in 1793. It is said of him: "He was a learned and broad-minded man; and the mountains, with their quiet sanity, seem to have helped him to bear constant vexation." His trials were more than once of a political nature. A sermon on the text, "Put not your trust in princes," caused him to be imprisoned in Innsbruck for eighteen months. It appears that the French, who had driven out the Austrians, were his jailers. Previously his monastery had been burned, his notes and manuscripts going up in the flames.

As a mountain climber his great ambition in life was to conquer the difficult Todi (11,887 feet). He failed in two attempts, but reached a gap known as Porta da Spescha, from which point he saw two chamois hunters climb to the summit, 1000 feet above. Father Placidus died a philosopher at the age of eighty-two. He has been described as "a mountaineer who missed his way and strayed into the priesthood." But, as a matter of fact, he was a mountaineer almost to the last. Cardinal Ratti is a mountaineer who has been elevated to the Vatican, and who never seems to have missed his way either in the Alpine passes or in the duties of his sacred calling.

In the early history of mountaineering in the Alps the church played a part which should be better known. Local monks first climbed the Titlis and Monte Leone. It was M. Clement, the curé of Champéry, who made the first ascent of the Dent du Midi. Bourrit, an ecclesiastic, had several triumphs to his credit, but he failed in an attempt on Mont Blanc, owing to bad weather. He won greater fame as an early historian of the Alps. He does not seem to have been ambitious for distinction in the church. To its honors he preferred the position of preceptor of Geneva Cathedral, which gave him leisure and opportunity for mountain climbing. He was an Alpinist in the summer and made copy of his adventures in the short winter days. It was Bourrit who wrote:

"It is there [in the mountains] that the rulers of the world and the heads of nations ought to hold their meetings. Raised above the arena of passions and petty interests, and placed more immediately under the influence of Divine inspiration, one would see them descend from these mountains, each like a new Moses bringing with them codes of law based upon equity and justice."

Among the most cherished memories of the new Pope in the Vatican will be the days and nights he spent in the great white spaces on the glacier of Tribolazione and among the peaks of Monte Rosa. It may be that from his hazardous experiences he will draw inspiration to discharge the responsibilities of his exalted office.

Playing-cards, according to a Chinese authority, were invented in 1120 for the amusement of the court of the Emperor Seun-ho. Eight centuries of trouble followed, but perhaps they would anyhow.

The former naval collier Jupiter is now the airplane carrier Langley. She was built at Mare Island and is said to be the first turbo-electric driven vessel.

VANITY FAIR.

Women on juries have been the cause of painful anxieties to many Eastern sheriffs of late, who have felt that new and expensive accommodations were needed for their protection while locked up. All sorts of chaperonage has been suggested, little of it consistent with the laws protecting persons on trial and other litigants; curtains have been hung in the night quarters, and more specific facilities for privacy have been installed in courthouse annexes, but things have not reached an altogether satisfactory condition. Now arises a new trouble and a new demand: the necessity for protecting the male jurors from women members. A case has arisen in Oakland in which affidavits affirm that a woman juror in a damage suit so wrought upon the feelings of other jurors by various forms of persuasion, running the gamut from cajoleries to browbeating and intimidation, that many votes were changed from a verdict for the defendant to one awarding the plaintiff $25,000 damages. The judge has granted a new trial, and expresses regret that the law does not enable him to do more than that. This passes the problem of chaperonage and becomes a matter of personal safety. It is no longer a question of conveniences in the jury hotel or a wing of the courthouse. The sanctity of the jury room and the integrity of verdicts must be preserved. A good way to do that might be to install iron cages in which the male jurors could take refuge while the women jurors raged without. Thus the men in their cages would be protected from the women in their rages; much like the animal tamer in the story, although his wife gave him no credit for valor when he fled from her wrath to the mercy of tigers. It is not, of course, a question of valor, but of justice. If cages will not do it, our male jurors may have to wear armor.

The resolution and desperate rigor with which society fights crime in this country was never better exemplified than in the suggestion made to Mayor Hylan of New York by Leonard Lieblich, editor of the Musical Courier, that burglars' homes be furnished with pianos. Here we may have the solution of our gravest problem, the supersession of all penology, the extinction of police departments, the end of crime. Some gentlemen were discussing a measure to permit the city to erect a municipal home of the arts, in order that more of the money of the taxpayers might be spent by those who know how to spend it, instead of by those who merely earn it and having earned it manifest a sordid disposition to save it, or use it selfishly for their own families—a self-centered motive which all constructive statesmen and blanked verse poets know should be resisted to the uttermost. Mr. Otto H. Kahn, who in his idle moments acts as chairman of the Metropolitan Opera Company, said he believed the cause of many crimes was a desire to get away from the dullness of everyday life. He thought music would be a deterrent. The mayor made the sensational statement that he was in favor of keeping down crime, and the musical editor came back at him with the prescription of a harpsichord for every crook, thereby scoring one in the penological progress race over August Vollmer, Berkeley's Golden Rule police chief, whom the Brass Rule nigger slammed in the beizer with a hunk of coal.

There has long been recognized by the intelligentsia or cognoscenti a sort of psychic harmony between melody and madness. It has also been recognized that criminals in their hours of ease are "moved by concourse of sweet sounds." As the librettist has said:

When the enterprising burglar isn't burgling,
When the villain isn't occupied with crime,
He loves to hear the gentle brook a-gurgling,
And listen to the merry village chime.

We believe, however, that this is the first time it has been proposed to counter crime with counterpoint. It would make an interesting experiment. It should not cost a municipality more than a few million to supply pianos to all second-story workers who could be induced to register their home addresses. The piano manufacturers would be glad to have the money; the taxpayers, as usual, don't matter. Those who do not perform with fluency by hand could be supplied with mechanical players. This, with all set, the millennium should begin, unless it wishes to wait for the twentieth amendment. A Chopin nocturne might be dangerously nocturnal. But a burglar who had made up his mind to crack a jewelry shop could console himself with a few "Gems from the Operas." It would not supply bread for his starving children, nor gauds and gowns for his poor wife, but doubtless that would soon become known to our penal psychiatrists, who would in turn convince our Golden Rule municipal authorities that no sincere reform could be accomplished until our burglars' ladies were made fit for the best society, and then these things would be remedied; at the taxpayers' expense, of course. Where else would they get the money? True, there would be difficulties, of a minor sort. For example, it is well known that burglars, like Jerry Cruncher with the rust always on his hands, sleep in the daytime and work at night. We could not expect this régime to be altered, so we may expect irritable neighbors who get tired of the strains of such masters as Schubert and Mendelssohn and Bach and Irving Berlin to throw open their futile windows and beg their burglarious serenaders for heaven's sake to go burgle something and let them sleep. Somebody is always interfering with the plans of our idealists, somebody is always dragging back our most interesting convicts to their lives of shame just when they are about to abandon business and turn honest. But in spite of such small defects the idea appeals. We have tried orchids, and pink tea, and indeterminate sentences and the parole system and psychology and almost everything except pianos and severe punishment. To avoid scarifying the hearts of our sentimental penologists through the infliction of severe punishment, by all means let the taxpayers prepare to pay for pianos; if it isn't that, it will be something else. That the taxpayers may not be able to afford any pianos of their own is a consideration unworthy any person devoted to the redemption of criminals. It marks the bourgeois soul, which can never rise above the level of its own till, can never understand why it is better to have its money taken by the state and devoted to the benefit of crooks than to risk having the crooks come and get it direct. Such persons are beneath the consideration of hobo-reformers, psychiatrists, and rag-time poets. And neither will they get it.

One small misgiving occurs. The most successful burglar of all time was Alexander the Great. He burgled Greece, Asia Minor, and Persia, and had jimmied his way pretty well into India, when his army began to count its share and called a strike on him. Not being gifted with the eloquence of Cortez under similar circumstances, he caved right down the bank and turned back. Soon afterward he caught cold, and feeling that his occupation, as Othello's would be after him, was gone, he died. Otherwise he might have organized a new gang and burgled the Chinese Empire, which would have made Japan's twenty-one demands look like a concession to sell red lemonade at a circus. And this great world-burglar liked music with his meals. Can any one doubt it after reading Dryden's testimony on the subject? It may be metrically dislocated here and there, but it is plain and direct. According to Dryden's statement, he knew Alexander personally, and Alexander had plenty of looters playing the lute around the cook-house where he ate. There may have been a few sackbuts and hautboys and citherns and citoles, too; but of course the case is not determinative because the piano was not yet evolved. In Alexander's day it consisted of a few strings stretched over a sheep-skull. Steinway had not yet put his mark upon it, and Godowsky would hardly have known where to put his magical fingers and thumbs. But if the sort of music Dryden describes could soothe Alexander and make him willing to stay around where Thais could tame him, a real Knabe might have been better for Persepolis than the antique fire department that so miserably fell down the night of the great conflagration. But even after this illuminating example the subject lies pretty much in the realm of conjecture. The piano idea is a novelty. It might drive some burglars to homicide. But it is no more absurd than some of the other modern ways of fighting crime.

Professor Utter of the University of California thus utters himself about spelling though without its ugh, and cough likewise, and autumn without its n, and other devices of the late Josh Billings and Theodore Roosevelt: "I found simplified spelling neither useful, beautiful, nor funny, and therefore a non-essential in the journalism of the world. It does not require any more effort to spell in the old way than to remember to simplify. Simple spelling can not establish itself by decree, for it has no authority. It must win its place by consent of the governed, and it has not a winning personality." That is utterly the best utterance Professor Utter ever uttered. Spelled words are pictures. To remove parts of them on the ground that we can get along with what is left would be about as sensible as removing the trees from a landscape painting because we do not need the wood.

Poor T. P. O'Connor! This versatile Hibernian has had to turn from the troubles of Ireland to the troubles of motion-picture censorship, and he has no assurance that they will be much easier to deal with. He is chairman of the British Board of Film Censors, and he says that on one recent occasion he had to see a film five times after his examiners had seen it three or four times and could come to no decision. It must have been one of those border-line cases. We do not understand why the coalition government should have inflicted this cruel and unusual punishment. It could not have been done in the United States, where we enjoy the safeguards of a written constitution. And we can think of nothing in the long parliamentary career of "T. P." to justify it. The mere fact that he is an Irishman should have furnished the suggestion of punishment enough, for whatever his offense, by merely sending him back to Ireland. The deodorization of unsanitary films is not easy. The British board has enumerated sixty-seven objectionable points, and like the long battle between the designers of defensive armor and offensive armament, we may expect the film producers to exercise the utmost ingenuity in the invention of ambiguous and unclassifiable offenses that may barely get by. In fact, an attractive "caption" preceding the exhibition of a film should be "Barely Passed by the Board of Censors." That ought to please everybody, and what more could a government agency desire?

There are today two women architects in Paris. Both passed their examination with such distinction that this fact found special mention in the presence of forty-seven male examiners. In England there are, according to the latest statistics, among others, 312 women physicians, 380 women journalists, 219 women pallbearers, 662 female cab drivers, 74 women chimney sweepers, 438 female smiths, 493 female drummers, and not less than 3669 professional painters.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The footpad's victim looked nervously down the barrel of the footpad's gun. "Be c-careful w-with that," he gibbered. "It might go off." "Ah, well," said the footpad. "I can easily reload."

When C. M. Bissell was in charge of the old Harlem Railroad he issued an order that whenever a conductor collected a cash fare he must give a receipt, and enter the amount on a stub. Very soon a committee from the conductors called and asked for more pay. Bissell inquired: "Why, boys, why do you ask for that now?" There was some hesitation and then the oldest committeeman said: "Mr. Bissell, you used to be a conductor yourself."

This is a tale of four Johns, from Chauncey Depew's "Memories." When John King was general manager of the Baltimore & Ohio under John H. Garrett, Johns Hopkins died. Another John King was executor of the estate. At the funeral he received this telegram, which he read and then handed to the other John King, for whom it was intended: "Present my sympathies to the family and my high appreciation of Mr. Johns Hopkins, and borrow from the executor all you can at 5 per cent.—Garrett."

A rural minister was bothered by the postman not only reading his postcards, but communicating their information to others. One day he wrote a postcard to a medical friend who lived at the other end of the village. It read, "I would tell you more only I know the postman will read it." Then he put the card in the letter-box, whence it was collected, and taken to the postoffice and sent out for delivery. The postman stamped into the doctor's office with the card, threw it on the table, and exclaimed angrily, "He's a liar! I don't read 'em."

One of the most frequently quoted arguments against prohibition is that it is hard on dope fiends. Not being able to take an occasional holiday from drugs with booze, the drug fiend is rapidly going to pieces. Prohibition Commissioner Haynes said at a luncheon in New York: "Well, now, if prohibition is hard on the drug fiends I'm sorry, for I don't want to be hard on anybody. But, friends, did you ever look at a drug fiend—his shifty eye, his lax mouth, his receding chin? It is hard to look at a drug fiend without repeating in utter discouragement the old Chinese proverb: 'Rotten wood can not be carved.'"

Chauncey Depew tells this one on Melville E. Ingalls, who as a railroad president had combined and rehabilitated several bankrupt lines. Ingalls returned for a rest to the little Maine village where he was born, and at the hot-stove senate in the general store an old farmer said: "Melville, they dew tell thet yer gittin' a selery of nigh onto ten thousand dollars every year." Ingalls, who was drawing several times that sum, admitted the ten thousand; whereon the old farmer observed: "Well, thet jes' shows whut luck an' cheek kin dew fer a feller."

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., said in a Y. M. C. A. address in New York: "Scientific management is here to stay. Those who oppose it are as shiftless as the old earl. The old earl, before going to his bath to dress for dinner one evening, for some reason counted his money, six five-pound notes, and laid them on his dressing table as usual. On returning from his bath he again counted his money, and one of the five-pound notes was missing. He looked ruefully at his valet busily fastening pearl studs in his evening shirt. 'Humph,' said the old earl, 'a loss of five pounds. I never counted my money before and I never will again. It doesn't pay.'"

Judge Oscar Hallam in his address before the South Dakota Bar Association told this good one: "I recall a case of assault and battery against the Koltski family, and in the course of the examination it developed that the Koltski family dog had taken an active part. Mrs. Koltski, when on the stand, was asked if she didn't instigate the activities of the dog. She insisted that she did not. The attorney said, 'Didn't you say, "Sic 'em, Caesar?" for that was the dog's name. She said, 'No, I did not.' The attorney said, 'You said something to the dog?' She replied, 'Well, what if I did?' He insisted: 'Tell us what you said to the dog.' She answered, 'Why, I said, "Don't sic 'em, Caesar.'"

"Before the world war," said Dempster Dunn, the Washington reformer, "a good many of us looked with approval on the sentimental socialism preached by Shaw, Wells, and certain other highbrows; but we've had a bit of a taste of socialism now, and it doesn't taste as good as it used to look. 'Boys,' I said to a group of Pinks the other day, 'I know exactly what you want. You want, in the first place, a régime where money doesn't exist.' 'Exactly!' the Pinks agreed. 'Where one woman doesn't wear thousand-dollar gowns while another goes in rags, but all dress alike in clean, sanitary, durable clothes.' 'Exactly, comrade!' 'Where all work the same number of hours, eat the same food, occupy the same kind of habitations!' 'That's the cheese!' 'Well, boys,' said I, and I sneered in the Pinks' excited faces, 'there are lots of places where that kind of régime is to be found. These places are called prisons or jails.'"

The Yankee invasion of Texas is making things difficult for the native plantation owner. After years of tenantry satisfactory on both sides, and particularly favorable to Uncle Jake, the old negro appeared before his landlord and announced his intention of leaving him. "Why, what are you going to leave me for?" asked Mr. Harris, who looked upon Uncle Jake as a life-long pensioner. "How come? Why, jes' 'cause I is gwine wo'k ovah on the Yank plantation yondah." "Why, you old sinner you! Haven't I always treated you fair and square? Given you your own garden and a good bit left over from your share each year to send your boy to Tuskegee and to buy Aunt Viny's clothes?" "You shuah nuff hab did all which you say, Mistah Harris." "Then why do you want to go over there when you can make more here farming my plantation on shares?" "This away," confided Uncle Jake, half apologetically and half proudly, "I is gwine wo'k ovah the'ah 'cause them Yanks they is call they niggers 'Mistah.'"

THE MERRY MUSE.

Love Lyric of a Cynic

The subterfuge
Of patch and rouge
Is far too crude for my love;
No painted cheek
Or lips bespeak
The charms ended in my love
Her pleasant face
Is not the place
Luella hides the trick of her;
The artifice
Of my sweet miss
Is in her heart. How chic of her!
—Dartmouth Jack o' Lantern.

Names.

Of all the toys that bend the back
Of that old peddler, Fame,
The cheapest bauble in the pack
Is an immortal name.
One cost the Good Samaritan
Two pennies at the inn;
And Charles the King, at last a man,
A thought for Nelly Gwynne.

King Alfred as a cook unbent;
Duke Harold spake a joke;
A sip of water Sidney spent
And Raleigh spoiled a cloak.

Step up: to think you must be flush
To buy a name is wrong;
Godiva bought one with a blush
And Lovelace with a song.

A Swiss Woman's Village.

The village of Champéry in Switzerland, canton of Valais, from which the ascent of the Dent de Midi is started, has two claims to fame, says the New York Tribune; its beautiful location and the fact that it is annually inhabited exclusively by women. Only a few officials belong to the strong sex, whose representatives, although natives of the village, stay there only temporarily.

The reason for this strange phenomenon is that there is no work for the men. The little agricultural labor required for the poor acres of the surrounding land is performed by the women. The men of Champéry are therefore compelled to look for work abroad. At the age of sixteen the young people emigrate and only return to the village for a brief stay.

The women are beautiful and strong. They wear neither skirt nor corset, but breeches and jerkin, while a red handkerchief wound around the head serves as a hat. The young girls amuse themselves with dancing, of which they are particularly fond, and with skiing. The old women indulge passionately in smoking, and fill their pipes with self-raised herbs.

If cough drops are advertised as being useful in the treatment of coughs they are not taxable now. If cough drops are advertised as cough candy, or not as being expressly useful for coughs, they are taxable. So runs the latest ruling from the funny house in Washington. Those tax experts can split hair into three parts lengthwise.—The Stirring Rod.

Of Orientals resident in Canada, British Columbia has 90 per cent. of the Chinese and Japanese and practically 100 per cent of the Hindus.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

AUSTRALIA'S CAPITAL.

The Sydney Herald reports as follows an address of Premier Hughes of the Australian Commonwealth on the subject of the proposed Federal capital at Canberra:

"I stand for the building of the Federal capital at Canberra with the greatest possible speed consistent with our financial circumstances. What that rate is I can not discuss at present. But I do say that this commonwealth will not come into the fulness of the glory that rightly belongs to it, and a public opinion that is Australian and not parochial will never be created, until the Parliament is housed on territory of its own.

"I should be very glad to answer a question as to when we are going to Canberra to take up our official residence, but I do not know, and I do not think any one else knows. About the constitutional obligation to establish the capital at Canberra there can be no question at all. It is perfectly true that the Constitution does not specify any time limit for the transfer of the capital, but time is the essence of all contracts, and it was undoubtedly the intention when the contracts were made that the capital should be built in our time.

"Unfortunately the war has intervened, and that no man could foresee. The consequences of the war are very obvious. We have, for example, a crushing debt, but this government was returned with a definite policy in regard to the capital. In effect it was promised that the government would push on with the construction of the capital up to the limit of its financial capacity. I can not amplify that any more just now, but by that promise I stand. I am a believer in Canberra. There is no Federal government in the world that can hope to stand as a power, or can hope to maintain a solid and enduring influence in a sea of parochialism unless it conducts its Parliament in its own house.

"We are a commonwealth made up of states, each one with a strong sense of its own individuality. If one state is to dominate the policy of the commonwealth, then it must be to the detriment of the other states. That is why the Dominion of Canada has its own Parliament in its own territory at Ottawa. Perhaps it is because of this thing more than anything else that Canada has made such progress. I do not think that we shall ever make the progress that the commonwealth deserves," Mr. Hughes concluded, "until we have set up our own Parliament. America and Canada in the very early days never had to face the position that now confronts us. Today we have a debt greater than that of Britain before the war. We have to consider very carefully everything that we propose to do. That is the only limitation at present upon the building of the capital. But it must be remembered that the Parliament sets the pace regarding the amount of money to be spent."

The State Exhibit of California Wild Flowers opens at the Hotel St. Francis next Thursday, April 20th, and continues for three days. Specimens for the display will be sent in from all sections of the state and will be labeled by botanists with their scientific and common terms, furnishing visitors with a liberal education in our native plant life. Brief addresses will be given on the subject by several noted speakers, and informal musical numbers will be added to the programme. The pageant of California wild flowers, an exquisite flower masque, will be given in the Colonial Ballroom on Saturday afternoon, April 22d.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Dowsett of Honolulu are visiting in San Francisco. They are guests at the Cliff.

Mrs. Gerald Williamson and her children will leave shortly for England, where they will spend the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Fentress Hill have gone to Chicago for a brief visit.

Mr. and Mrs. Platt Kent have taken possession of their new home in San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Pool left last Tuesday for New York to join Mrs. Richard Sprague.

Mrs. Edna Davis Moore is visiting Mr. and Mrs. Walter Filer in Burlingame. The Filers recently reopened their home there for the summer season.

Mr. and Mrs. George Nickel returned last week from a visit with Mr. and Mrs. George McNear at their home near Mount Diablo.

Mr. and Mrs. George McNear and Mr. and Mrs. Leo Korbel have returned to Petaluma, after a brief visit in town.

Mr. and Mrs. John Pitcher of Chicago have been spending several days in San Francisco.

Mr. Homer Curran is passing several weeks in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Willott are entertaining the latter's niece, Mrs. William Ballantine of Washington, at their home on Scott Street.

Mrs. William La Boyteaux and Miss Mary Stuart La Boyteaux have been spending the past week at Del Monte.

Miss Barbara Donohoe has returned from Baltimore, where she has been spending the winter with Mrs. Richard Cromwell.

Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Lowery and Miss Edna Taylor will leave today for Menlo Park to spend the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles McCormick have reopened their home in Menlo Park for the summer months.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Stent returned today to their summer home at Atherton.

Mr. and Mrs. Lorin Tryon, who have resided at the Fairmont since their return from their wedding trip, have taken a house on Green Street.

Mrs. Peter Martin and Mr. Charles Oelrichs Martin, who have been traveling abroad, are at present in Italy.

Mr. and Mrs. William Leib are traveling through China and Japan. They will not return home until July.

Mr. William La Boyteaux will arrive today from New York to join Mrs. La Boyteaux and their daughter over the Easter holidays.

Mr. Adolph C. Miller, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, is in California on a business trip. He and Mrs. Miller are visiting Mr. and Mrs. Homer King and daughter at their home on Broadway.

Among those registered at the St. Francis are Mr. Carl Stearne, Seattle; Mr. Edward A. Nolte, New York; Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Goldberg, Los Angeles; Mr. J. G. May, St. Louis; Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Jones, Oak Park, Illinois; Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Spalding, Boston; Mrs. D. C. Scott, Tacoma; Mr. George R. Gibson, Chicago; Mr. W. C. Fischer, St. Louis; Mr. S. P. De Lano, Mr. E. J. Keane and family, London, England; Mr. and Mrs. Lester E. Wise, Detroit.

CURRENT VERSE.

Wonder.

Come out with me and watch a line of mountains
Crawl like a huge blue snake across the distance;
Or hear a row of trees like glittering fountains
Splash in the sun with sibilant insistence;
Come out and see how goldenrods are burning
Where spring brushed by and left a fire that lingers,
Or try to touch them, all the while discerning
How in the breeze they shy beneath your fingers;

And some rapt windless night come out and listen
To the gold glimmering stars silently flowing
Over the world, a stone in a stream where glisten
Strange lights from skies of which there is no knowing;—

And through your spirit's unlit deep will blunder
Like dusk, a hush and holiness and wonder. . . .

Clouds.

There is a splendor in the castled clouds
That float like ghosts of vanished Babylons,
When haughty silence moves above the crowds
And sunset fills the blue with carven bronze.

There is a grandeur in the peopled mists
Dark with the secret shadows of the sea,
Rolling to keep their hushed mysterious trysts
With phantom Babylons that are to be.

O you who crowd the streets, and laugh and cry,
You do not realize some distant time
Silence shall chant the epics of the sky,
Your dream, your grief, the glitter of your prime;

The shadows of your towers and lights and homes
Shall float above some unborn city's domes.

Spring's Pilgrimage.

When Spring is born of Winter
Then there comes a day
In early April with the warmth of May,
The clouds go gadding and the winds turn mild,
And Spring is born in sunlight,
Merry child!
Her nurse is April with the misty eyes;
The birds sing round her cradle
Where she lies
In green-streaked woodlands by the mantled ponds,
Where the young ferns unfurl their snakey fronds.

She comes up from the South
With a bird whistle on her pouting mouth,
And sits upon some hill
Her mother, Winter, has kept cold and still,
Till her Sun-lover melts the snow—
Then out the strong floods go,
Leaping like horses to the sea,
And the green frogs go mad with glee.
Ah! When that child is on her way
The trees make ready, in the North
The robins herald her
And the buds put forth.
Puss Willow's little catkins are a-strir,
And it is all, is all for her!

But for a little while
She lingers in the South,
Wandering the moss-draped aisle,
Brushing the shiest flowers with her mouth,
Tuning her swanny throat
To the lush warble of the swamp-bird's note,
Beneath the lamp-hung jasmine's vine tent
Her warm, delicious childhood soon is spent.

Then forth she fares,
About the middle of the month of May,
A young girl, wild-eyed, gay;
The mountains are her stairs,
The birds her harbingers,
With merry song
The peewit pipes her as she trips along—
The trumpet flowers blow fanfares.
Even the sea caves know her
And deep down
The mermen chime the bells
In some dim town,
Where wrecks lie rotten and forgotten;
The shark's fin glides
More avidly among the sea-isle tides—
The whole glad earth
Hails her with gales of mirth.
The frantic midges dance;
There is tumultuous lowing from the cattle.
When Spring fares northward from the South,
The young sun bangers for her cherry mouth
And the black stallions scream as in battle.

The Ruins of Carthage.

Seldom has there been an archaeological enterprise which piqued curiosity as does the proposed excavation of the site of Carthage; for Carthage was not merely one of the greatest cities of the ancient world, but the greatest metropolis of the Semitic race, says the New York Tribune. It was a city which more than any other, save only Rome, was calculated to affect and to determine the subsequent history of the world. It was there that was fought to a finish the struggle between the sons of Japhet and the sons of Shem, and that was determined whether the Aryan or the Semitic should be the dominant race. The Punic wars were not merely international; they were ethnic.

With all its greatness, it was the fate of Carthage to perish more utterly than any other city of comparable importance and to leave fewer of its own records than any other. Carthage had apparently little or no literature or art of its own. Of all its literature only two books survive, and they only in translations—the "Periplus" of Hanno and the "De Re Rustica" of Mago; and neither of them tells us anything about Carthage itself and its people.

We have therefore been dependent for our knowledge of Carthage upon the two nations which were its inveterate enemies and one of which was its ultimate destroyer. That in those circumstances we should have so favorable an account of it, and particularly of its greatest man, is perhaps the highest tribute that could be paid to it and to him. Hannibal's only historians were the hostile Romans, and yet their story of him, in spite of their enmity, is so eulogistic that he has come to be regarded as perhaps the greatest of military leaders.

Cato's demand at last prevailed, and Carthage was destroyed with a completeness which no other such city ever suffered. Yet we can scarcely doubt that beneath the desert sands there lie relics of the past the unearthing and interpretation of which will throw new light upon the history and character of the city.

There will be special timeliness and perhaps profit in exploring the remains of Carthage, just as the spiritual civilization of the world has emerged from a great struggle for supremacy with the purely material, because precisely such was the struggle which ended in the destruction of Carthage. That city fell and left no annals of its own because its civilization was wholly material, while that of Rome, with all her faults, had regard to letters and art, to philosophy and laws, to the spirit as well as to the body of mankind.

Some faint idea of the debt of the eleven billion dollars owed the United States by the Allies may be derived from the fact that the whole Christian era has lasted few more than a billion minutes.

A New Pledge.

The members of the Chicago Women's Club have subscribed to the following pledge:

"I love the United States of America, I love my country's flag, I love my country's language. I promise:

"1. That I will not dishonor my country's speech by leaving off the last syllables of words;

"2. That I will say a good American 'yes' and 'no' instead of an Indian grunt 'umhum' and 'nup um' or a foreign 'ya' or 'yeh' and 'nope';

"3. That I will improve American speech by enunciating distinctly and by speaking pleasantly and sincerely;

"4. That I will try to make my country's language beautiful for the many boys and girls of foreign nations who come here to live;

"5. That I will learn to articulate correctly one word a day for one year."

A young Parisian inventor hopes shortly to enable the fashionable Parisienne when promenading the Bois de Boulogne to enjoy the strains of the orchestral music sent out by the Eiffel Tower wireless, to hear the latest scandal concerning her best friend, and to receive a detailed report from her cook concerning the progress of the pot-au-feu for lunch. This young inventor has placed the radio antennae in a parasol so that madame when expecting a communication from home or desiring to hear a concert has only to raise her dainty sunshade and "listen in."

A WAR-TIME BLESSING.

Helium has figured prominently in discussions pertaining to airship explosions, and particularly to that of the Roma. Many aeronautical engineers have attributed the failure to use this non-explosive levitating gas as the cause for the heavy loss of life in the Roma accident, since many passengers might have survived the fall if there had been no explosion and consequent fire. A timely article in this connection is headed "Helium: An Important National Asset," by Lieutenant-Commander Zachary Lansdowne, U. S. N., which appeared in a recent issue of the U. S. Air Service. Commander Lansdowne has the distinction of being the only American to cross the Atlantic by air—he was a member of the crew of the British R-34. He says that helium is one of the few war-time governmental undertakings which has proved to be a blessing in disguise:

"Helium is one of nature's own products; it is not a manufactured compound, but a true chemical element. The invention of the spectroscope made its discovery possible. In 1868 the British astronomer, Lockyer, visited India to observe an eclipse of the sun visible only in that country. Using the spectroscope for the first time to examine the colored atmosphere which envelops the sun, Lockyer noted a bright yellow line in the spectrum which did not correspond with that of any known substance. The discovery of a new element was conceded; Lockyer named it helium, after helios, the Greek word for sun.

"In 1895, twenty-seven years after Lockyer's discovery, helium was found in the earth. It was really stumbled into during experiments with natural gas consumption, the reduction of uraninite, in the analysis of the air, and certain gases given off by mineral springs. Various experiments with helium brought out its remarkable properties, all of which were well known at the beginning of the world war, hence the feverish haste with which the Allies hunted all available gas supplies in an effort to obtain helium in sufficient quantities to make it a factor in the struggle. The search was in vain, although an extremely minute percentage of helium was found in the gases given off by the volcanic fumaroles near Naples, especially Mount Vesuvius.

"When we entered the war, however, a further diligent search was made in this country for adequate supplies of helium to fill the balloons and airships in use among the Allied forces. The search was made with good reason, and the expenditures made by this government entirely justified, for helium is the real 'pooh-bah' gas of the aeronautical world.

"Being absolutely inert, thus not combining with any other substance, helium can not burn; moreover, only the most extreme temperatures of heat and cold affect it, consequently it has extraordinary stability with respect to volume; that is, it does not readily expand or contract, a vital characteristic in airship gases. Pure helium has 92 per cent. of the lifting properties of pure hydrogen, the lightest known gas, while hydrogen is highly inflammable and readily combines with other elements, is inordinately affected by heat and cold and sunlight, and diffuses with rapidity. Small wonder that the Allies wished to replace hydrogen by helium!

"While our efforts to supply helium for use at the front did not materialize, we did extract enough of the gas to permit us to ship to the coast en route for Europe 150,000 cubic feet. The armistice, however, stopped the shipment. Considering the time factor alone, this was more than a creditable performance; it was remarkable. Before our joint army and navy helium board began work there had never been extracted more than 150 cubic feet of helium in all the world. And it was worth, on the market, $1750 a cubic foot. It can now be produced for 10 cents a cubic foot."

Inside Dublin Castle—what are the alterations? Mr. Griffith's first order has been to tell the judges and the civil servants and everybody so employed to go on in the immediate future exactly as they had been going on in the immediate past, says P. W. Wilson in the North American Review. The fact is, of course, that for a generation or more Ireland has been, in all essentials, governing herself. The idea that relays of British bureaucrats proceeded to the country to rob the poor people of their hard-won savings was untrue. The civil service in Ireland is in the main Irish. If Mr. Griffith tried to dismiss the civil servants it would be from Ireland, not England, that he would hear. Also, the entire local government of Ireland—the cities, towns, and counties—has long been elected by the Irish themselves, and the establishment of a Free State here will make no difference except a return to what President Harding calls normalcy.

The municipal authorities of Frankfort, Germany, have decided to name a principal street after Jacob Henry Schiff, American philanthropist, who was born there January 10, 1847. The Schiffs, whose record is said to be the longest of any Jewish family now in existence, have been residing at Frankfort since the fourteenth century. As an expression of their gratitude, the heirs of the financier presented the authorities with 2,000,000 marks to be used for municipal purposes.

Coaxing the Millennium.

An invitation has gone out to the people of California to go to the polls next November and commit an act of Bolshevism; not Bolshevism with its Terror, which might not be popular in this state, nor wholesale Bolshevism all at once, but a little of the essential principle of the thing, which is the destruction of capitalism, or private property in the instruments of production, and the substitution of the state as the producing and distributing agency. This is all the Russian socialists want, and all they have perpetrated the Terror for; and to the extent to which they have been able to bring it about, private capital in Russia was for a time and to a large degree eliminated, and the government took over the industries. That has enabled the people who did not like capitalism to feed, shelter, clothe, and educate the rest of the Russians on a basis of socialism. "Under socialism," as our agitators love to put it, the clothing has not been very good and is pretty much worn out, education is confined largely to show schools, shelter is falling down, the factories have become debating and disputing societies with broken roofs and demolished machinery, the table board in general has been very poor, and the nation has become what Dean Inge calls a "festering corpse." It is proposed to try a little of this great political principle in California within the field of water and power development, about as much as can be executed for half a billion dollars, to be raised by mortgaging the state; and the public will have an opportunity at the November election to vote on the proposal in the shape of the Water and Power Amendment to the Constitution. How the half-billion dollars is to be raised under this plan, and what shall be the main powers and privileges of the unknown board that is to have the spending of it, is indicated by Morton Todd in this week's Argonaut. The article points out, in terms of politics and economics, the meaning of this effort to put the government into business. It will be followed by others showing the essential unsoundness of policy involved, and some of the results achieved in North Dakota by having business done by politicians instead of by business men. The matter demands the attention of the electorate now in order that the gravity of the situation may be understood in time. It can be stated with confidence that this is the most amazing proposal ever put before the voters of the state, and it is all the more so because of the teachings of recent events.

Germanizing Russia.

The news of a Russo-German treaty, negotiated and signed at Genoa without the knowledge of the Allies, is somewhat portentous, although the general condition of eastern European affairs has long made it evident that there was a decided drift in that direction. Russia sadly needs reorganization and discipline, as well as a revival of industry on the only basis that can promise production, which is the capitalistic basis; and Germany is amply talented to bring about that reorganization, reestablish production and distribution, and swing again into world power as the dominating force of a well-disciplined population of more than 200,000,000 people. The old French proverb says "opportunity makes the thief." Russia has been Germany's opportunity, and German perfidy has done the rest. Observers of events have seen it coming for some time; for, after all, it is a quite natural economic arrangement under existing circumstances.

The question now before the world is whether the Allies are to permit the new union to get the jump on them, or in some way change those circumstances. Disarmament in Germany has probably been a sham and a cheat. We do not know, and the commission of the Allies can not discover, to what extent the disarmament terms of the treaty of Versailles have been evaded by the nation that regarded the guarantee of Belgian neutrality as a scrap of paper, but if the Allies have been building any hopes on German promises of becoming nationally impotent, they have been quite simple-minded. A few years under the new treaty would see Germany on her feet, and Russia, under her tutelage, producing vast quantities of munitions and storing them where they could readily be come at for a new onslaught on the civilization of Western Europe which the Teutons and the present rulers of Russia appear to hate with equal venom.

Why, then, should there be so much insistence that France lead the way in the reduction of land armaments? Her lessons have been bitter, and she has not permitted her interest in the restoration of trade to blind her to the possibilities of more war and the prudence of preparedness. A survey of fifteen centuries has shown that after the fall of the power of Rome with its genius for keeping the peace throughout the empire, the Germans have broken across the Rhine and invaded France at average repeated intervals of fifty years. Those experiences are ingrained in the texture of French tradition. They are part of the national consciousness, almost of the national blood inheritance. Probably there has been no generation of Frenchmen for all those centuries that has not heard from the elders at the fireside, and read in the national literature, accounts of the ravages of German armies on French soil, and the last, too well remembered, exceeded in calculated savagery anything that had gone before. A friendly and allied Russia to the eastward was an important element of security. That Russia is no more. She has gone crazy, and passed over to the enemy. Until she was in some way restored to sanity and usefulness France could only expect a recurrence of the blow. And there is far less hopefulness in the situation now than a week ago.

It is not a bright prospect for anybody, except the German militarists, who are again busy publishing their books of war philosophy, amended to meet the present fluctuant state of Europe and of Asia. It belies the hope of a limitation of land armaments, and if the business assumes an aspect of menace in the near future it may even have serious repercussions on the reduction of navies. The millennium has not yet arrived. A lamb might lie down with a sick lion, but he would only be safe until the lion recovered his appetite. It seems hardly time for general disarmament, although it may take ten or twenty years for the Germans to make ready to strike. In the meantime we should be glad President Harding has not yet yielded to the sentimental pacifists and congressional fence-menders, and consented to dangerous reductions of the army and navy personnel. Until peace is really here and on a secure foundation, no sane people with anything to lose can permit the art of war to be forgotten, or its military nucleus to be so diminished that fresh armies and navies could not quickly be trained. Such views may seem gloomy, but they are better than for the nation to wake up at some distant day when the lessons of these days have been forgotten, and find that it has been living in a fool's paradise.

The American Plan.

If 2100 building trade mechanics in this city wish to quit their jobs, they have a right to do it. We can imagine no emergency in time of peace that would justify any social power in compelling them to remain at work. To say that the public interest requires that there shall be no strikes or lockouts is a doctrine at war with the public's highest interest of all, which is liberty. The men have a right to quit in protest against the non-union status of other men on the jobs with them, or because they do not like the color of the architect's necktie, or the brand of plug tobacco the foreman chews. This is a free country, and that is their right, and it is a right they can not bargain away without injury to the whole social order, of which they are a part. Schemes of compulsory arbitration may work as temporary expedients, but they are not American, and they are not worth the individual liberty they cost.

If the contractors on the building jobs now going on in San Francisco wish to ignore the union rule against having non-union men on the job, that is their right, too. It is more than their right, it is their duty. That rule is an un-American thing. Pushed to its logical end it would turn hundreds of thousands of independent Americans into a Hindu caste of jobless men. It is also an outrage on the public. Its general observance would cause an increase in the cost of living. The public might conceivably be willing, under some extraordinary condition of general distress, but it was never consulted, no such condition exists in this country, and we do not believe it is willing. It has a moral if not a legal right to the benefit of open competition in labor as well as in other things, including capital. That right has often been stolen from it by agreements amounting to conspiracies between employers and employees. Of the humbug doctrine that capital and labor should get together, Ambrose Bierce, one of our keenest intellects, once said: "God help the rest of us if they ever do." They did, and the public has paid. No pretense can disguise it.

The American Plan is the first "out" from that situation San Francisco has seen in twenty years. It is rightly named. It needs no defense. No condition ever should have been permitted to arise that could make it appear a novelty. It means that no man shall be discriminated against (and at the public expense) because he sees fit not to join a labor organization. That is all there is to it—and it is enough. Nothing less is American. The right to work when work is offered is just as sacred as the right to quit work, and the whole powers of the state and of society should and must be brought to bear to protect and enforce it.

Labor unions, as a matter of policy, keep up the hue and cry that the government is on the side of capital. That is in no sense true, and it should never be permitted to become true, any more than government should be permitted to range itself on the side of union laborism. The public interest is in an enforcement of the peace, and of American principles of freedom and legal equality. More than that neither capital nor labor has a right to demand.

Under the American Plan, as far as it has been in effect in this city, there has been a more rapid advancement of San Francisco than this generation has seen before, and more work for the building trades than at any time since the fevered days of reconstruction following the earthquake and fire. Not all the recent progress can rightly be ascribed to the open shop, nor all the preceding paralysis to the closed shop; nor is prosperity the whole test of the matter. But the fact remains that the closed shop is un-American and wrong in principle, and never should have been tolerated by the general public, which is the party that had to pay for it, and further that it has retarded the progress of San Francisco about as long as this city ought to stand it. The Argonaut is making no special plea for the contractors. Few of them are pure and holy men who would set the public interest above their own. Nor is it trying to defend the system under which materials are controlled in quantity and price, and withheld from jobs on which only union men are employed. Its interest is that of San Francisco and the general good, which can only prosper as a whole on a basis of equity and right.

One phase of the situation must be admitted: in San Francisco, owing to the coercive closed shop conditions of the past twenty years, the best workmen, generally speaking, are in the unions. That is their privilege and their interest. But it has nothing to do with the right of a man who is not a union member to have work if work offers, regardless of that particular fact, nor with the right of the public to have him at work if he wishes to labor and can find an employer willing to hire him. One contention of the labor leaders is that the presence of an inferior laborer on a job, receiving equal wages with the effective union workman, tends to slow down the better man. It need not. A contractor would be very unwise who, having his free choice, continued to employ inferior workmen for any reason whatever, and if the contractors have their freedom of choice that matter will take care of itself through survival of the fittest, to the public benefit; as most matters do under conditions of liberty. Union labor must understand, too, that the crimes committed in its name and for its cause in the past are still unforgotten and unforgiven in this city, and that a repetition of them will not be tolerated.

The California Historical Society.

The third reincarnation of the California Historical Society revives interest and evokes enthusiasm in one of the most fertile fields of American research. It is a rather remarkable fact that California, with one of the richest and most dramatic of state pasts, is the one state in the Union to take her heritage casually. Our interest in the past is both casual and spasmodic. It might even be termed faddish. Whereas that of other states, even though their histories read as mere records of immigration and emigration, is a carefully kept public institution.

And it should be so here. A state need not be charged with overweening local pride to keep its records and tend its cemeteries and other local landmarks. In fact historical societies are state institutions in many states, perhaps in most—a cogent reason why they are so buried in oblivion. A state historical society undoubtedly does it work, and does it adequately in so far as research and record are concerned, but it fails of necessity in the third article of its creed—that of keeping awake popular interest. It is one of the assets of the revived California Historical Society that it is of the nature of a personal enterprise and that its appeal is directly to the individual citizen. Needless to say, has the great disadvantage that a state society escapas—it must be self-supporting. The latter fact accounts for its intermittent vitality.

Now that it is on the mend for the third time and giving promise of entire recuperation, it is not amiss to review the facts of its history. The origin of the California Historical Society is apocryphal—a fact which should add a haze of glamour to the already sufficient glow of our subject. The society supposedly originated in 1852 and was incorporated April 29th of that year under the name of the Historical Society of the State of California. However, according to the office of the corporation commissioner in Sacramento there is no record of any such incorporation; nor has the California State Library any record of this first organization. The only clue to its existence was a statement probably made at the time of its "revival" in 1886 by Mr. Doyle, the president of the third society. Meanwhile there had been a second attempt in 1870. The society of '70 is only less mythical than its predecessor of 1852. The golden age of the association was the 1886-1893 period, during its third and palmiest epoch.

The society of '86 was largely due to the efforts of Edward S. Holden, who came to the university at the end of 1885 as president. Knowing nothing of the previous associations, he and a few others interested in the preservation of California chronicles organized a third society under the same name. After a singularly flourishing era from 1886 on, the organization suddenly flickered into oblivion in 1893. An unsuccessful attempt was made to revive it in 1903.

The present effort should be more successful. For one thing there is a steadily accumulating interest in the literature of California, an interest not confined to the state. The present manifestation is a voluntary movement on the part of several gentlemen who are eager to promote an historical society of California and who desire that it shall be placed on a sound foundation. The cause of failure of the previous societies was undoubtedly the lack of a sufficient financial basis. Funds are needed for the collection of information, for the publication of a regularly issued journal as well as occasional extra publications, and for the maintenance of adequate quarters. It is proposed that the necessary money shall be secured by means of subscriptions of one hundred dollars per year, payable for a period of five years. The response to date justifies the society's hope for a prosperous future.

Some Rare Jury Effects.

Behold, now, the apotheosis of adiposity. Arbuckle returns from the judicial laundry cleansed and almost purified. Few traces of impudicity are left, and these, it is hoped by the owners of his films, will not be noticed. That particular hope may or may not be well grounded, but in either event there can be no doubt of the rehabilitated value of the celluloid. It has taken eight months to do it, and a total expenditure of perhaps $500,000, a tremendous part of which this luckless city and county contributed, and which the moving-picture industry ought to reimburse to it.

But what is that compared to one of the grandest triumphs of the jury system known to Anglo-Saxon annals? Out of three juries, twenty-four jurors, not counting the alternates, voted him innocent, and twelve voted him guilty, although the twelve were not on the same jury. If he could have obtained the last verdict at the first trial, he would have been 100 per cent. pure; pure as a lily, or a dove, or a milk-white doe, or anything else noted in song and story for utter spotlessness—whether such things deserve their fame or not. As it is, there are those votes for conviction—two at one time and ten at another. Had those twelve jurors been gathered at one trial, their opinions would have been just as valid, but what a difference it would have made to the defendant, and to the owners of his films!

It recalls, in reverse, the case of the Man from Yallerhouse, suspected of having smallpox. The Strangers took a vote on it, and "those in favor of this here bein' smallpox" won. If a few more members had attended the meeting who believed that it was not, the Man from Yallerhouse would have had his health. As it was, he had to be hospitalized in the town calaboose and nursed by the marshal, a severe penalty for such an offense.

The Arbuckle business is quite Pythagorean, being so much a matter of numbers. On the numerical basis, the defendant is twenty-four thirty-sixths, or two-thirds, pure. It is enough. In fact, for purposes of profit it is probably far better than 100 per cent. purity. The two-thirds will justify the commercial gentlemen engaged in the motion-picture "art" in releasing the corpulent person's films, on the basis of the current humbug that the patrons of the movies want pure pictures; and the other one-third of doubt, or impurity, or whatever you wish to call it, will probably cause long lines to form at the box-offices of three thousand theatres on the basis of the fact that they do not. An Arbuckle film just released at Buffalo caused an increase of 20 per cent. in the "house." Thus vision tempts the venture and reality gathers the money. Mr. Arbuckle is vindicated, the jury system is vindicated, the movie fans will have what they want, and the film owners will be rewarded in a manner beyond the reach of the censors. Mr. Hays holds up the release of the cherubic pictures temporarily, but there is little doubt that some benzoate of soda can be found which will make them as pure as the person they depict. What more could any one ask?

Well, there is this the public could and should ask. We infer from the argument of Mr. Gavin McNab that he believes testimony was concocted, or doctored, or "processed," by the district attorney's office to secure a conviction that it once seemed might be popular, but that would have been unwarranted by the guilt of the accused. Since we can not believe that an attorney of Mr. McNab's character and standing at the bar would descend to misrepresentation, or even to improper loose talk, in order to save a guilty client, we must suppose that he had reason to believe what he said when he said it. Arbuckle's three trials are said to have cost us some $20,000, and probably they came to more than twice that, if we count the time and labors of a lot of deputies and detectives and bailiffs, not to mention the rental of the courtroom space which any well-conducted department store would charge. There is also the fear that some innocent man might be convicted to make a district attorney's popularity. That is, there is a possibility that some such tragedy might happen, although we grant its improbability, for we believe that almost all men who reach the bar of justice under indictment are guilty. Nevertheless, considering the power of the district attorney's office, and the effectiveness of its courtroom proceedings, the thought that it might ever become overzealous and exceed the limits of proper practice in order to secure convictions which some gust of popular passion demanded is disquieting.

If Mr. McNab has any evidence that such a thing has occurred in the Arbuckle case, he owes it to the public to lay that evidence before the grand jury, and put the district attorney's office on its defense in the matter. He owes it to the public, and he owes it to his client, who has had twelve out of three dozen jurors vote him guilty, and whom a considerable number of persons who have followed the case in the public prints are not yet satisfied to believe altogether innocent, in spite of the statement prepared by Attorney Brennan of counsel for the defense and signed at his suggestion by the third dozen of jurors. The district attorney's office should welcome such an opportunity to clear itself of Mr. McNab's charges, if it can, for the wholly extemporary retort of Attorney Friedman, to the effect that if they had been jobbing the case they would have done a better job, is not in itself decisive. They might, and they might not. They might have lacked the talent to fabricate a more conclusive texture of evidence.

Altogether, the case raises questions that have not been settled by the verdict—not the question of Arbuckle's guilt, which is settled in the sense that it can never be reopened in a criminal trial, but questions of the efficiency of the jury system, and of the character of prosecution before juries. Too many of these trials are dropped as soon as the verdict is in. If Mr. McNab does not care to appear before the grand jury and submit what he knows and believes about the integrity of this particular prosecution, we believe the grand jury has ample power to ventilate the business. It could hire special counsel, summon the attorneys and detectives and witnesses on both sides, and make an effort to learn the whole truth about what has taken on the appearance of an extraordinary case looked at from either end. That would vindicate the grand jury, which as an institution to be continued indefinitely is in some need of it. As to the petit jury trial system, that is probably beyond cure by any direct treatment, homeopathic, allopathic, osteopathic, chiropractic, Christian Science, Home of Truth, or anything else. The irrationality of its operation is enough to tempt both sides to impropriety in trials. But it has acquired an almost sacred character, and we shall probably have to endure it for a long time.

Editorial Notes.

In Napa County, orchards and new lands are being planted to grapes. They may yet bear huge signs reading "The Repeal of Prohibition Would Destroy This Vineyard."

The ownership of Wrangell Island seems likely to become the subject of dispute between Great Britain and the United States, the point at issue being priority of discovery. Stefansson claims it for Britain on account of his recent visit, while the American claim rests on the work of the Corwin and the Rogers when they were searching for the survivors of the De Long expedition, in 1881. The natives are said to be friendly to both sides. In that case, why hasn't anybody thought of leaving it to the natives? They were there first.

At Carmel-by-the-Sea, the town political ticket stigmatized as long-haired, or anti-progressive, has won. Enough heat seems to have been generated in the campaign somewhat to warm but not burn out the bearings of the social machinery, and peace has settled over the dunes which Perry Newberry declared were better than glass factories. The trees, the soft roads, the winding footpaths, have been relieved, and humbug progress will have to stay its hand. The outcome may be regarded as a successful protest, not against real progress, necessitated by natural growth and changing conditions, but against the selfishly forced improvements that tend to satisfy the financial hunger of the improvers and a few small tradesmen rather than the needs of the community as a whole. If Carmel continues to grow, as it will perforce, and by virtue of the very features preserved by the anti-progressives, it will reach a stage where material improvement will have to be permitted. Then the antis will have no recourse except to move to some less thickly settled neighborhood. It is sad, but human experience shows that the city can not be the country and keep its health.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Some Needless Burdens.

SAWTELLE, CAL., April 13, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I am a member of the Soldiers' Home, Pacific Branch, and am greatly pleased to have access to your valuable Argonaut, and particularly to read the many articles on the bonus. I have thought many times I should compliment you.

I have been associated, as orderly, with about 150 of the world war boys during the past two years. I have wondered why some of them should be in the hospital. I am sure their benefits, at an expense of $3 per day to the government, and compensations of an average of $60 per month, should be discontinued; high rollers, out much at night, and in bed much of the day; always ready for their meals.

The men referred to, and others in the homes who are well and able, should be out and earning their living instead of laying back and bleeding the government for everything possible.

It's a pity we have not more men of influence like you and Harding and Mellon who dare to act. You declared your position when the bonus was more in favor than now.

Again you are in accord, I think, with most of us as to the destiny politically of Senator Johnson. His fall began when he snubbed Charles E. Hughes at Long Beach, California—a man who is so far his superior.

I served my country all through the civil war.

Respectfully, E. P. THAYER.

From an Appreciative Reader.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 15, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: I want to congratulate you upon the article in last week's issue, entitled "Political Meddling." I have not seen or read or heard anything that strikes so directly at the root of the matter as that article. I believe that the people generally are more and more coming to the same conclusions concerning government concern for the public welfare. There seems to have been in the last fifty years a complete reversal of the functions of government, and from being a creature of the people it has become a sort of benevolent dispenser of bounties. Nothing truer has been said than your "if government were omniscient, its interference would not be a good thing because it is much better that men should work out their own salvation." To my mind anything beyond police activity is altogether out of the province of sound government, and history teaches that anything further is the beginning of the end of all government. And when we in this twentieth century are adopting and propagating theories and enacting laws which centuries ago were weighed and found wanting, we are putting out the signboard that we are traveling the road all republics and democracies have trod.

I. H. MORSE.

A decline was registered in railroad traffic during 1921 of 28.3 per cent. under that of 1920, the greatest ever recorded in American transportation history, according to the Association of Railway Executives. Compiling the estimates from reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the association said that in 1921 the number of tons of freight carried one mile in the United States was 344,167,000,000, or 104,390,000,000 less than the ton-miles of 1920. The decrease in the Eastern district was 24¼ per cent., in the Western district 22½, and in the Southern 20.6.

THE WATER AND POWER AMENDMENT.

Californians Are Invited to Assume a Debt of $500,000,000 for an Experiment in Socialism.

That infantile habit of mind which instinctively turns to the government as to an indulgent papa to do the things that should be done by the individual has combined with the ambitions of some self-appointed improvers to produce an amazing proposal to the people of California. It is that they amend their Constitution so that the whole state shall be mortgaged for half a billion dollars to be put into the hands of some unknown persons yet to be appointed by an unknown governor yet to be elected, in order that they may buy sites and develop water and hydro-electric power, and engage in any other business helpful to such development, and sell the power at cost. And it would cost like sin.

The proposal will come before the voters at the November election, under the form of the California Water and Power Act, an "initiated" measure, and if very many of the voters are careless enough to stay away from the polls and permit the minority of professional meddlers to vote the thing through, they will have put the matter beyond the control even of the legislature.

Among the docile Germans such a proposal would be in keeping with the paternalistic policies that have undermined personal morality and good sense and turned them into obedient cannon-fodder for militarists; but among the Americans, whose individual freedom and private enterprise have made them the richest and most powerful of nations, and especially among the descendants of the California pioneers, who were accustomed to settle their affairs without leaning on the government, it is, to say the least, anomalous.

It can only be ascribed to the growing spirit of political meddling, hoping to revolutionize society through the loose economic thinking of large numbers of our people and get it on a basis of Russian communism. It is to be done under the guise of a battle of "Democracy vs. Privilege," as the printed propaganda for the enterprise puts it; in relation to which it may be observed that Bolshevism was initiated that way, and so was the Non-Partisan League brand of socialism, which in less than seven years has almost bankrupted the State of North Dakota. Yet 80,000 persons have signed the initiative petition for the water and power amendment. It is easy to get people of a certain type to sign anything they are requested to sign, if approached by an amiable drummer working at the rate of 10 cents an autograph.

The provisions of the act should be examined by the persons who are invited to mortgage their homes for its objects.

In the first place, the mere size of the proposed issue is alarming, and suggests some soap-box philosopher's wild and disordered vaporings. Five hundred million dollars would increase the state's debt six times. The interest alone, $30,000,000 a year, would amount to about two-thirds of the entire present financial requirements for conducting the state government. The "full faith and credit of the State of California is hereby pledged for the payment of the principal of said bonds as the same mature, and the interest accruing thereon as the same falls due." That makes it a mortgage on every stick of property in California, on every farm and every home, and with the proceeds it is proposed to plunge into one of the most technical and speculative undertakings the scientific imagination coupled with the boldest spirit of financial adventure has ever developed. This is no business for politicians. It can only be conducted safely by the most highly trained electrical and mechanical engineers, on principles laid down by the most skillful of financial experts and enforced by men of the greatest administrative talent and resolution, through organizations built up and disciplined like armies. Any other approach invites disaster. But it would not be disaster to the officeholders. The losses would fall on the taxpayers. The waste, the mistakes of judgment, the costly experimentation, the false starts and neglected detail, the imperfections of management, the laziness and office jealousy and personal pretensions and lack of team work among the various human elements engaged—these things would not be checked and corrected by shrewd men fearful of financial losses, but would be left, as all such matters in government are, to the handling of appointees whose personal fortunes were in no way involved, and who would always have the comfortable feeling that whatever their mistakes, neglect, and lack of vision, the public would have to foot the bills. Private enterprises are worked out under the fear of bankruptcy. Why should any particular political appointee, why should all of them put together, fear to bankrupt state projects so vast and intricate that no personal responsibility could ever be traced through their complexities? The people can always pay more taxes.

In fact, paying more taxes is specifically provided for in the proposed act itself, and in two ways.

First, with the money raised by the sale of the bonds, sites and properties are to be bought, and thereby removed from the taxing power of the state. That means the state will have to raise its revenues by taxing more heavily the balance of the privately-owned property. There is no escape from that. There are only a hundred cents in a dollar, and it won't stretch. All the office-holders, including the new army of them to be appointed under this project, must be fed. As Governor Johnson said, "a man must eat." The job-holders under this scheme would eat a great deal, for it takes about two men that can't be fired to do the work of one man in private employ that can be.

Second, the proposed amendment will, if adopted, provide that "if at any time the moneys in the state treasury applicable to the payment of interest or principal of said bonds shall be insufficient to pay the same as it falls due, moneys shall be temporarily advanced from the general fund for that purpose, and there is hereby appropriated from the general fund in the state treasury such sum annually as will be necessary to pay such interest and principal, and there shall be collected each year in the same manner and at the same time as other state revenue is collected such sum in addition to the other revenues of the state as shall be required to pay the sums appropriated for payment of interest and principal as herein provided." True, the board must return it—if it can. If its speculative ventures go wrong, however, the taxpayers will make up the deficiency and stand the grief.

The proposed act provides that bonds may be sold not only to get capital to develop a project; but if the project loses money, if it has been a mistake like the Non-Partisan League's packing-house at Fargo, and various other ventures, and there is no market for the water and power developed, or if the development has been badly engineered, or has proceeded in so wasteful a manner that no rates the public is willing to pay will cover interest on the investment, more bonds may be issued for operation and maintenance. That is pyramiding the debt. In private business it leads to a crash, almost inevitably. But under this plan it will not, because the taxpayer is always here. He can not escape. He just "pays, and pays, and pays."

The California Water and Power Board, which this amendment would create but the members of which the long-suffering taxpayers do not yet know, would have virtually unlimited control of the expenditure of the money. The surety bonds of the members would be fixed by the governor, and while the legislature would have the power to raise their salaries it would not be empowered to remove them except by a two-thirds vote of all its members, and then only for dereliction of duty, corruption, or incompetence. The legislature must provide for their possible recall by the people. But as a matter of practice, neither method of removal is ever likely to be effective even to displace a corrupt official, and if it were employed it could not make good his stealings or his waste or his mistakes of judgment or his careless administration of his office. The checks in the proposed act are poor security for the moneys it is proposed to borrow. The real security is in the homes and farms and stocks and bonds and savings accounts of the people of California.

This as yet unknown board is to have power to buy, condemn, or lease any property necessary or convenient for the purposes of the act; and to build anything necessary thereto; even to require the reservation from sale or other disposition of any land or material of the state it thinks it may need—water, water rights, dam sites, no matter who wished to develop them. It could condemn copper mines if it fancied them, start equipment factories, build distributing systems for towns that have none in order to sell them power—to do about anything it might wish to do with the taxpayers' money, with only the flimsiest pretense of check upon its acts. The board could enter into contracts with the United States or other states. It would be subject to no practical control as the corporations now serving California are. Such powers are dangerous for any men to have, and would put the board in a position to make itself the real government of the state.

Perhaps the most dangerous angle of this grant of power is the rate-making one. The board would have the privilege of discriminating between different localities and different customers. That would enable it to punish political disobedience by raising rates for energy or for water, or buy political support by spending huge sums in doubtful localities. Nobody could escape it. The worst tyrannies ever charged against a monopolistic railroad in this country before the days of the Interstate Commerce Commission would be well within its privileges. It could build up a manufacturing centre at the expense of others already established, and then rule it under a threat of ruin through raising the price of its basic necessity. Under the best imaginable conditions of administration, every enterprise, every law, and every institution in California would have to play second fiddle to the projects of the Water and Power Board. And the public does not know, and will not know next November, who its new rulers are to be.

The provision for condemnation proceedings indicates the limitless power the proponents of this visionary speculation with other people's money intend to confer upon the board. It makes the board's decision conclusive evidence of the necessity of taking the property it sues to condemn. Courts can not protect from it. Under this provision all the hydro-electric plants in the state could be removed as possible competitors. A key unit of operation could be taken from a going concern and the balance left a cripple. Thus the board could acquire an unrestrained, unregulated government monopoly, so vast in its operations that no conceivable public vigilance could ever detect and prove its incompetence or its corruption, or do anything about it if it could.

There are other provisions of minor importance, too voluminous to recite here. They are mostly for the object of supporting the main policy and carrying out the purposes of the act, which are identical with the purposes of the Bolshevik government in Russia, as far as hydro-electric development is concerned. It is not yet proposed to sweep all the industry of California into state operation at once, as they attempted in Russia, but the principle is exactly the same. It is a scheme of governmental paternalism, and it appeals to the childish imagination of impractical dreamers and doctrinaires. What it proposes is by far the most extensive and irresponsible experiment in socialism thus far offered in the United States. There is no public exigency that calls for it. It is purely gratuitous; a "flier," in support of a vision and a dream, in the most difficult and technical field of modern industry, and one in which much remains to be discovered and developed. The powers it seeks to convey in order to make the fantasy come true are such as no people jealous of their liberties would ever entrust to any political body if they could help it and knew what they were doing.

Of course, some of the busy supporters of the scheme (persons like the mayor of Berkeley, elected partly by the votes of Finnish socialists), who perhaps look for some lucrative attorneyship or other job in so great a speculation, talk fervently of the injustice done the people by capitalists who have "grabbed" power sites and made themselves rich at the public expense. But if such "grabbing" had never taken place, the streams that now turn up electric energy in California, lighting our homes and rotating the wheels of factories, would now be running wastefully to the sea, coal mines and oil wells would never have been opened for the making of gas and kerosene, and we should still be using tallow dips and whale oil lamps for light. And a sad but instructive fact about it is that the two capitalists whose great practical talents did more than anything else to develop hydro-electric energy in this state are comparatively poor men today, and they knew their business better than any board any governor is likely to appoint to make this colossal dream materialize. If the men that conceived and built the early power projects of California could not keep off the financial rocks, clever financiers as they were, Heaven help the taxpayers when the political Water and Power Board gets through dipping into the state treasury to make good its amateur mistakes.

The peculiar type of mind that sympathizes with this scheme has begun to disclose itself. It is of the sort that is dazzled by the word-paintings of Marxian socialism, until it hates anything practical and anybody that has pursued practical methods to concrete achievement. It believes that all that is necessary to promote the welfare of society is to drive the individual out of business and put the government in his place; notwithstanding that all civilization is the result of individual initiative working for private profit, and almost never getting as much of it as it had a right to hope. A government is never anything but a lot of office-holders. Men have never been able to create one that could do their work as well as they could do it for themselves, or serve them as well as their own free efforts do. But in the complexity of modern affairs this fact is lost sight of, and visionaries dream of a perfect social order, which only greedy and evil men prevent their fellows from entering. So they start such movements as the Non-Partisan League of North Dakota, and waste the money of the taxpayers until a state is nearly bankrupt, or they make a Russian revolution and turn a vast empire into a soup kitchen.

The declared purpose of the proposed amendment is "to conserve, develop, and control the waters of the state for the use and benefit of the people." That is exactly what is being done today by private corporations, and better done than any government will ever do it. That the state can do it cheaper through political appointees with nothing at stake but money belonging to somebody else is an idle dream. But there are people in numbers that cherish such dreams. Some of them are banded together in little flocks of the fervent and the faithful under the style of the Non-Partisan League. They have adopted the Water and Power Act as part of their programme of North Dakota ruin for California; and that is the sort of act it is, and the sort of support it has. MORTON TODD.

The United States Navy has a new use for motion picture: and a new sort of machine with which to take them. By means of a long-range picture machine of new type excellent photographs of shots landing in target practice are now taken from a safe distance. There is no hand-cranking as the machine is run by a tiny motor.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Werner Triebner, Germany's premier parachute jumper, recently successfully performed his fifty-fourth parachute jump, which is said to be the world's record.

Mrs. E. W. Bemis, formerly of New York City, has been elected county commissioner for Cook County, Illinois, in which capacity she will help manage a $3,660,000,000 corporation. Mrs. Bemis is the first woman to hold an elective office in the history of Illinois.

Two "reds" were recently elected to the municipal council of Paris, when André Marty and M. Badina were overwhelmingly chosen for office in the city council. The two communists were elected to the council last year, but were not allowed to serve, as the council of state ruled that they had lost their civil rights as a result of having been convicted for a part in the Black Sea mutiny.

One of the foremost big-game hunters in the world is a twenty-three-year-old girl, Miss Martha Miller. As a member of the Akeley party of the American Museum of Natural History to the jungles of Central Africa, Miss Miller carried off the hunting honors in competition with two experienced men. The only elephant bagged on the expedition was brought down by Miss Miller, who also has a lion or two to her credit.

Albert Wolff, Belgian composer and former French director of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. For the past fifteen years Mr. Wolff has been with the Opéra Comique of Paris. For several seasons he acted as chef d'orchestra and was later made musical director. M. Wolff, who is a Belgian by birth and a naturalized Frenchman, took a valiant part in the war as an airman. It was while he was in the army that he composed the music to "L'Oiseau Bleu."

Queen Elizabeth of Belgium is honorable president and surgeon-in-general of the hospital at Rosebruge, Belgium, which is maintained by Mrs. Edward L. Spears, wife of the British general. Mrs. Spears, who was formerly Mrs. Borden Turner of New Jersey, has a vast fortune derived from lacteal patents, which she spends unstintingly for philanthropic purposes. The hospital at Rosebruge has the benefit of the most improved surgical instruments and treatments are installed immediately upon scientific acceptance.

Syud Hossain, who was one of the three specially elected delegates sent to Paris and London in 1920 to put the Indian case before the Allied statesmen who drafted the peace treaty with Turkey, is India's foremost publicist and probably her greatest peacemaker. Mr. Hossain is at present writing for the English and American press in an effort to clarify the Indian muddle. Syud Hossain has been editor of the Independent, the largest national daily newspaper in Northern India. He was also at one time editor of the official organ of the Indian National Congress in London.

Poland has a new leader in the person of Dr. George Michalski, Polish minister of finance, who consented to accept this post in the Ponikowski cabinet on the condition that his own programme of reconstruction be authorized by the Diet. His condition was accepted and Dr. Michalski enjoys as a consequence an arbitrary power probably never before possessed by a minister of finance. He is said to be the nearest approach to a dictator extant out of Russia. The new Polish leader was for years head of the Land Bank of Galicia, which was the means of furnishing financial backing to Galician agriculture before the war. When Poland was reorganized after the peace of Versailles there was a popular demand for Michalski's inclusion in the government, but as his suggestions were not well received he refused to consider office until the recent offer of the Diet after the fall of the Witos ministry last September. Dr. Michalski's progress toward withdrawing Poland's huge issue of paper currency and creating new taxes has been remarkable. He has accomplished what financial experts declared to be impossible.

Mayor James Michael Curley of Boston, who is known as the "low-brow" mayor as a polite concession after his older epithet "the convict candidate" and "the convict mayor," is one of the most interesting personalities in the country. Incidentally, none of the nicknames quoted above is justified. Curley is not an ex-convict, though he was once in jail for sixty days for a remarkably quixottish reason. He and another man had taken some civil service examinations for a couple of friends who lacked intelligence enough to pass them themselves. As for the epithet "low-brow," beloved of Boston high-brows, it has stuck to him since his debut into politics from Boston's low-brow district, the old Seventeenth Ward. Curley's father was a day laborer and Curley himself did not get through grammar school. His tastes, however, are anything but low-brow; he is an ardent student of the classics as well as of American politics. His present term is not Curley's first as mayor of Boston, despite the immense prejudice against his past. He was mayor for the term 1914-18, but was defeated for reelection in 1917. Among other phases of his political career was his period as congressman—he was a member of the Sixty-Second and Sixty-Third Congresses. His great achievement in the three months he has been mayor was to persuade Washington to open Boston's grain harbor. He succeeded by public subscription in making up the differential on grain sent to Boston.

Drinking.

The thirsty earth soaks up the rain,
And drinks and gapes for drink again;
The plants suck in the earth, and are
With constant drinking fresh and fair;
The sea itself (which one would think Should have but little need of drink)
Drinks twice ten thousand rivers up,
So fill'd that they o'erflow the cup.
The busy Sun (and one would guess
By 's drunken fiery face no less)
Drinks up the sea, and when he's done,
The Moon and Stars drink up the Sun:
They drink and dance by their own light,
They drink and revel all the night:
Nothing in Nature's sober found.
But an eternal health goes round.
Fill up the bowl, then, fill it high,
Fill all the glasses there—for why
Should every creature drink but I?
Why, man of morals, tell me why?
—Abraham Cowley.

Uriel.

It fell in the ancient periods
Which the brooding soul surveys,
Or ever the wild Time coin'd itself
Into calendar months and days.

This was the lapse of Uriel,
Which in Paradise befell.
Once, among the Pleiads walking,
Sayd overheard the young gods talking;
And the treason, too long pent,
To his ears was evident.
The young deities discuss'd
Laws of form, and metre just,
Orb, quintessence, and sunbeams,
What subsisteth, and what seems.
One, with low tones that decide,
And doubt and reverend use defied,
With a look that solved the sphere,
And stirr'd the devils everywhere,
Gave his sentiment divine
Against the being of a line.
"Line in nature is not found:
Unit and universe are round;
In vain produced, all rays return;
Evil will bless, and ice will burn."
As Uriel spoke with piercing eye,
A shudder ran around the sky;
The stern old war-gods shook their heads;
The seraphs frown'd from myrtle-beds;
Seem'd to the holy festival
The rash word boded ill to all;
The balance-beam of Fate was bent;
The bounds of good and ill were rent;
Strong Hades could not keep his own,
But all slid to confusion.

A sad self-knowledge withering fell
On the beauty of Uriel;
In heaven once eminent, the god
Withdrew that hour into his cloud;
Whether doom'd to long gyration
In the sea of generation,
Or by knowledge grown too bright
To hit the nerve of feeble sight—
Straightway a forgetting wind
Stole over the celestial kind,
And their lips the secret kept,
If in ashes the fire-seed slept.
But, now and then, truth-speaking things
Shamed the angels' veiling wings;
And, shrilling from the solar course,
Or from fruit of chemic force,
Procession of a soul in matter,
Or the speeding change of water,
Or out of the good of evil born,
Came Uriel's voice of cherub scorn,
And a blush tinged the supper sky,
And the gods shook, they knew not why.
—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

The Ballade of Dead Ladies.

Tell me now in what hidden way is Lady Flora the lovely Roman?
Where's Hipparchia, and where is Thais,
Neither of them the fairer woman?
Where is Echo, beheld of no man,
Only heard on river and mere,—
She whose beauty was more than human? . . .
But where are the snows of yester-year?

Where's Héloïse, the learned nun,
For whose sake Abelard, I ween,
Lost manhood and put priesthood on?
(From Love he won such dule and teen!)
And where, I pray you, is the Queen
Who willed that Buridan should steer
Sewed in a sack's mouth down the Seine?
But where are the snows of yester-year?

White Queen Blanche, like a queen of lilies,
With a voice like any mermaid,—
Bertha Broadfoot, Beatrice, Alice,
And Ermengarde the lady of Maine,—
And that good Joan whom Englishmen
At Rouen doomed and burned her there,—
Mother of God, where are they then? . . .
But where are the snows of yester-year?

Nay, never ask this week, fair lord,
Where they are gone, nor yet this year,
Except with this for an overword,—
But where are the snows of yester-year?

Those European nations seem to be in the position of the man who complained that his creditors wished him to deplete his capital by using it to pay his debts.

CLEANSING POLITICS IN THE "FIFTIES."

Mary Floyd Williams Contributes an Historical Study of the Vigilance Committee.

The writer of this review long hoped that some serious modern historian would treat at exhaustive length of the San Francisco Vigilantes, without apologizing for them. Mary Floyd Williams adopts a somewhat exculpatory inflection, and at the same time handles the subject so thoroughly and well that her work in this field is unlikely to have a successor. Her "apologetics" are good; but they are unnecessary, and being so are a bit individious. The brave and dangerous labors of the Committee of Vigilance are the chief glory of local history. No such "color of romance" has tinged the dawn of any city in America since the conquest of Mexico. And no really open-minded San Franciscan can read Miss Williams' book without that feeling of pride expressed by Kipling when, paraphrasing St. Paul, he said: "Of no mean city am I."

The above criticism is not meant in any spirit of censoriousness. It is more an individual dissent from a detail. As a whole, the work is admirable and of the utmost historical value. The clear and lively narrative, the explicit descriptions where material existed, the exhaustive treatment indicated by the voluminous footnotes and a second volume of more than 800 pages of "papers," all copiously indexed, mark a work of first-class importance. It is edited by Herbert E. Bolton of the Department of History of the University of California, issues as one of the university's publications in history, and is a worthy product of scholarship. If anything has been assumed, or left to chance, or taken whole from the loose accounts of secondary historiographers, this writer is unable to detect it. The documentary foundation appears to be without a crack.

The work of the reorganized Committee of '56 has in large measure veiled from our retrospective gaze the far more critical beginning in '51. Yet the Committee of '51 was the body that took the long chance and defied a government which, for all its members then knew, might have beaten and destroyed them. The identity of the two organizations is thus indicated:

It has been necessary to touch lightly on five years of California's development in order to place the Committee of Vigilance of 1851 in its historical relation to the Committee of 1856. The latter is usually designated the "Great Committee," and the work of the former is obscured by the more spectacular features of the larger association. Yet in spite of the silence that lay between the last notice of the Committee of '51 and the call that rallied the Committee of '56, the organic unity of the two bodies is proved by many tokens: by the personnel of the leaders, by the adoption of the old constitution, by the membership certificate with its significant "Reorganized," and by the silver medal struck for the committeemen, which bears the old symbol, the Watchful Eye of Vigilance, encircled by the legend "Organized 9th June, 1851. Reorganized 14th May, 1856."

Social conditions were unusual. They had sprung out of nothing. Even physical equipment for dealing with crime was absent:

The total lack of prison facilities gave rise to most perplexing problems. Under the Mexican system the punishment of white culprits had usually taken the form of a fine, while Indians had been whipped. In consequence the jails were not constructed for other than temporary confinement, and when a guard was necessary it was furnished by the citizens. The inventory of prison equipment in Yerba Buena, January, 1846, consisted of

- 1 serviceable padlock
- 2 chairs
- 1 pair of shackles which are missing and should be searched for in passing

It is said that a hungry prisoner of that town called on one of the first American alcaldes with the door of the calaboose on his back, and demanded his breakfast.

Most of our readers are familiar with the state of society produced by the presence of the "Hounds" and "Sydney Ducks," and the Tammany politicians who got control of the infant government and sold them protection. It was against political corruption that the Vigilantes were forced to rebel. The movement was corrective of politics more than of crime itself. Here is the picture:

The only stabilized asset in the state was official patronage, and the exploitation of a people absorbed in financial adventures and unambitious for political preferment. This exploitation was conducted with a persistency of purpose, a skill in organization, and an utter abandonment to corruption that turned party conventions into a farce, dominated elections by bands of shoulder strikers and repeaters, and invented ballot-boxes that served the bosses exactly as his magic hat serves the stage magician. Amateur politicians were helpless in such hands. They passed ordinances to regulate gambling, drinking, and social disorder, built their jails, and even elected many incorruptible magistrates, but every sporadic effort at reform was frustrated by the intrigue that kept the tools of the bosses in the strategic positions of administration and finance.

Here, too, is a good sketch of the administration of justice, the more interesting because it involves the familiar figure of Sam Brannan, who afterward became the first president of the Committee of Vigilance of 1851:

Legal methods of the time may be illustrated as follows. In December, 1848, C. E. Pickett, a merchant at Sutter's Fort, killed a man in self-defense. Sam Brannan, who had a store at the same place, insisted that Pickett should be tried for murder. When the first and second alcaldes and the sheriff resigned to avoid conducting the prosecution, Brannan called a mass meeting to elect new officers. Every one who was suggested for alcalde declined and finally Brannan, himself, was chosen. The nomination for a prosecuting attorney likewise went through the circuit of the meeting, and was also finally accepted by Brannan. The prisoner then procured counsel, the sheriff pro tem. was ordered to bring drinks and cigars for all concerned, and arguments lasted far into the night, while Captain Sutter, one of the jury, wrapped in a Mexican serape, leaned against the wall fast asleep. Brannan, as prosecuting attorney, summed up the evidence against the accused in spite of the fact that Brannan, as alcalde, was judge at the trial. The jury disagreed, and the sheriff was charged to hold the prisoner, but, as he had neither jail nor irons, it was decided to admit Pickett to bail, which was promptly furnished by the jurymen. "Thus ended the first criminal trial ever had at Sutter's Fort. At a subsequent and soberer trial Pickett was acquitted."

At San Francisco, things were quite "mixed" socially, and in need of American regulation. Our author notes:

The typical pioneer was no longer in the ascendant. Men came from every section of the land, and from every walk of life. Puritans and drunkards, clergymen and convicts, honest and dishonest, rich and poor—they strode side by side across the plains, crowded the decks of steamers, and worked shoulder to shoulder in the diggings. A little later came all the world, and the people of Europe and Asia and Africa brought to California every social inheritance entailed upon humanity since the dawn of history.

Not much humor is to be expected in the tragic business of illegal capital punishment, but Miss Williams has perhaps unconsciously accomplished it in one condensed paragraph which samples to us the life of the locality. Sam Whittaker was not the first man the committee hanged, but he faithfully represents the type—and the times. Of his contributions to the general welfare we are given this beautifully shaded little pastel:

After some vicissitudes he formed a partnership with an Australian named Teddy McCormac, and together they opened the Port Phillip House, which quickly became a rendezvous for thieves and ruffians. There the two men led a career of successful crime until they treacherously despoiled too intimate an acquaintance, one James Kelly, "the fighting man," who reimbursed himself by selling out the Port Phillip House while the senior partner was in Monterey committing perjury in the interests of the robbers of the Custom House. Whittaker, thus dispossessed, removed to the Hogans' establishment during Mr. Hogan's absence in the mines.

That was the state of affairs which some critics of the Vigilantes have maintained should have been left for correction to the "constituted authorities." It had been left to them, and it had continued because it was left to them. In passing we may mention that one of the most strenuous advocates of "law and order," in opposition to the lawlessness of the committee, was the city attorney, Frank M. Pixley, founder of the Argonaut. When the Vigilantes hanged Stuart, Pixley lost a steady client who was often in need of defense against larceny charges. Stuart's confession complains of the stiffness of Pixley's fees.

The nature of the committee's purpose and methods is shown in the following paragraphs:

The primary object of the Committee was not the punishment of criminals, but the protection of society. As soon as the courts gave promise of better efficiency the Committee turned to them as the most desirable source of discipline, and adopted the policy of delivering to the officers of the law those prisoners whose guilt was so clearly established that conviction might be expected, and whose crimes were not so heinous that the safety of the community demanded their execution.

It has already been stated that the Vigilantes preserved written records of their work, signed by their names or identification numbers. The "Minutes and Miscellaneous Papers of the San Francisco Committee of Vigilance" fill eight hundred octavo pages, and represent hours of laborious and conscientious writing on the part of the officers and members. No one can glance even casually through these unique documents without receiving a profound impression of the order and system prevailing in the work of the Committee. They have also an air of intense sincerity; the very haste and roughness of composition preclude the idea of evidence deliberately fabricated to conceal brutality or injustice, and careful comparison with the contemporary press and with the law reports there published establishes their accuracy so far as verification is now possible.

As retold from the records of its daily work, the proceedings of the Committee were not impetuous or reckless, but rather painstaking and cautious, both in seeking criminals and in controlling the activities of the more impulsive members. The methods adopted to accomplish these purposes are perhaps the clearest indication of the spirit which animated the organization.

One of the most active figures in the movement has, we believe, received too little credit for his part until Miss Williams' researches disclosed how really vital his services were. This was Stephen Payran, who furnished the underlying philosophy or at least the major premise which such movements always need. Of him the author says:

It is a very curious circumstance that while so many of the members, even those of minor importance, have left behind them biographical records of more or less interest, little can now be learned of the man whose personality really dominated the most active months of the association. This was Stephen Payran, number 46 [42], who served as president of the Executive Committee from about July 4 to November 12, 1851, and who wrote a large number of the more important papers filed during the intervening period.

In August, 1851, Payran stated in the newspapers that he had then been in California nearly three years. Other committeemen have said that he was a professional copyist from Philadelphia, and the neatness and legibility of his handwriting testify to his skill in such an employment. More than any other member of the committee he gave voice to the idea that the people had a right to assume direct control of public affairs, when their elected representatives failed to carry out their will. His sincere conviction, his quick imagination, and his ready pen gave him a power of expression that distinguished him as a sincere idealist from among the more practical merchants who did not extend their thoughts beyond the emergencies that confronted them.

Of course, there are striking presentations of such familiar figures as Brannan, William Tell Coleman (with a portrait), and of Isaac Bluxome, the dreaded and mysterious "33, Secretary," who signed the decrees. There are many other biographical notes; but these are details. We can only suggest the broader outlines.

That first hanging must have been a breathless affair. The others could proceed on a basis of experience and practical immunity, but the first one was a plunge into the unknown, a testing of unmeasured forces. Would the community support the committee, or permit the political machine it was attacking to overpower and hang or ruin them all? Could they even rely on one another? It was exactly the situation that confronted the American revolutionists when Franklin told his colleagues they must all hang together or they would all hang separately. Such crises take a majestic courage, and the Vigilantes had it. Says the history:

So matters stood when the meeting of Tuesday evening adjourned, after some hundred men had signed the roll. While a small group lingered in the room a startling knock beat upon the closed door, and when it was opened two or three members of the committee entered, dragging between them a powerful and defiant prisoner. This was John Jenkins, who had that very evening entered the empty office of George W. Virgin on Long Wharf, seized a small safe, and dropped with it into a boat lying at the end of the pier. Virgin arrived in time to raise a hue and cry while the thief was still in sight. Seeing that capture was imminent Jenkins threw his booty overboard and surrendered to a boatman, John Sullivan, who had joined the chase as he was returning from a vessel lying out in the stream. David B. Arrowsmith and James F. Curtis, both members of the committee, assisted Sullivan in securing his prisoner, and George E. Schenck, who encountered them as they emerged into Commercial Street, urged them to take Jenkins before the Committee, instead of to the police station, as had been their intention. The suggestion was adopted, and in a few minutes the newly pledged Vigilantes faced the first acute problem to arise under their self-assumed responsibilities.

In this case there was no doubt as to the overt act of violence nor as to the need for assembling the General Committee. Suddenly the bell of the California Engine Company struck a signal unfamiliar to the ears of San Francisco: two measured taps, a pause, two taps, another interval, and again the two notes, until the attention of every man within its sound had been caught by the summons. Quickly the Monumental bell echoed the call: two strokes and silence; two, and two, and two! Then San Francisco swarmed into the humming streets, and as the initiated passed swiftly to the rendezvous at Brannan's building, a mystified crowd ran behind. Without there was excitement; men knocked at the guarded door, whispered a pass word, and gained admission, or asked in vain because they were ignorant of the countersign. Within there was hasty consultation, initial confusion, and swiftly emerging order. There was a chairman, Brannan, and a secretary, Bluxome. An immediate trial was decreed. A jury was selected; Schenck was appointed prosecuting attorney; the particulars of the theft were rehearsed by witnesses. The evidence was conclusive; the verdict was "guilty."

While the majority of the Committee advocated summary action lest delay might defeat their plans, they felt that it was necessary to ascertain whether or not the community at large would support them in their self-assumed office. Sam Brannan, therefore, was appointed to address the men without, and to ask for an expression of their sentiments. The events of the evening were thenceforth shifted to the open streets, and we can find full reports in the contemporary newspapers.

At a quarter before 1 o'clock Brannan mounted a sand dune near the place of trial, the crowd closed in about him, and he told them of the formation of the Committee, the arrest of Jenkins, and his trial for grand larceny. He recounted the nature of the evidence, the clear proof of guilt, the conviction, and the sentence of death within an hour on the public square. Then he demanded that his auditors declare whether or not this action should be approved. The response was a tumultuous cry of "Yes!" mingled with cheers and some dissenting "Noes!" Next came a voice from below: "Who is the speaker?" Mr. Brannan was named—and no name was more familiar than his. Another voice: "Who are the Committee?" But the prudent and sympathetic assemblage raised a warning cry: "No names! no names!" and then divided, some hurrying to the Plaza to watch developments there, and some remaining behind to await the appearance of Jenkins.

The Committee of Vigilance was thus fully launched upon its public career within a week of its initial gathering, and so strong was popular sentiment in its favor that the authorities took no steps to dissolve it. The verdict of the coroner's jury never resulted in any indictments, and the "association of citizens styling themselves the Committee of Vigilance" was unhampered in the prosecution of its work.

The work grew. The Vigilance Committee became practically the government of the town. It even searched ships for undesirable immigrants, long before such a policy was ever enforced at Castle Garden.

They were an obstinate lot. With the help of the governor, and Jack Hays, the sheriff, Whittaker was rescued from the committee's jail. There was an investigation of suspected negligence, at which the sheriff appeared and vindicated the committee members who had had the prisoners in their custody. Then occurred this grim episode:

On the very day after the rescue Hays allowed Ryckman to interview the prisoners. "Mr. Ryckman," said Whittaker, "I hope you are not sorry that we made our escape." "You have not made your escape," was the inexorable reply. "You have been convicted, and you will be executed beyond the shadow of doubt. There is no power on earth that can save you."

And in spite of the sheriff they took Whittaker and McKenzie from the county jail and hanged them. That made four. Some order was restored, and committee activities subsided, but they had to be resumed under William T. Coleman five years later. There followed at San Francisco ten or fifteen years of the best municipal government in the United States.

All these developments are admirably traced against broad backgrounds of American social inheritance. No more valuable contribution to local history has been made, and very few things have been written on local subjects that are as fascinating.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending April 15, 1922, were $141,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $135,100,000; an increase of $5,900,000.

Just at the time when Wall Street and the business community as a whole had settled down to belief that no important action of the markets, no change for the better in the financial outlook, could occur before spring was much irregularity in the railway and industrial securities. With the foreign government bonds dealt in on the New York Stock Exchange, however, the market reached an almost unprecedented pitch of activity. Largely because of the greatly increased purchases of these securities, transactions in bonds far surpassed all previous records for the period; the total of purchases of the foreign bonds alone, during the two first months, rising from $40,000,000 in 1921 to $100,000,000 in 1922. Practically all of the foreign loans rose above the prices at which they had been subscribed in the five preceding years.

This happened in the face of a series of new foreign loans, running beyond a hundred million, which were offered and immediately taken in the American market. It did not merely measure overflowing American surplus capital, nor did it merely indicate the awakening of the American investing public to the striking fact, shown by the calculation of the largest international banking house, that out of a total $2,587,000,000 of Allied government loans placed in New York since the war began, $1,769,000,000 had actually been redeemed by the end of 1921. As a matter of fact the rise in similar securities on the London market, especially after the Bank of England's discount rate was reduced in February to the lowest figure since the war began, was more rapid than the advance in Wall Street.

British war loans went in that month well above their original price of issue; both these and other high-grade English securities sold 10 to 30 per cent. above their lowest price of 1921. With all due allowance for the influence of the world-wide fall in money rates on values of fixed investments, this notable movement testified as positively to a changing view regarding the economic outlook of the European countries whose governments had put out these bonds as the great rise of United States bonds during 1867 and 1868 testified to the belief of that day's home and foreign investors in this country's future.

At the beginning of the present year the rise in foreign exchange had halted. Rates on the European countries had already risen as much as even the banking community thought was warranted by the European situation. This view was held not only by the London philosophers who had been talking of "stabilizing" sterling exchange at $3.63, or by the English bankers who last autumn intimated that financial London, disliking rapid changes, would be well content to see the rate remain for a year or so around $3.80. The franc had declined sharply on the New York exchange market when France opposed the attitude of her allies on the questions of armaments and German reparations, and a new French ministry came into power on that issue. Nevertheless, resumption of the upward sweep of exchange rates during February brought the franc to the highest rate since January of 1920, and carried sterling from $4.17 to $4.44½, which compared with its low price of $3.18 two years ago and was only 42 cents, or 9 per cent., below the normal par of exchange. Some of the very people who in England were talking last autumn of the impossibility of maintaining the rate above four dollars are now remarking comfortably that sterling may reach par of exchange next summer.

The expectation may easily be premature. But the change of attitude was strikingly embodied in last month's public statement of the Chancellor of the British Exchequer to Parliament, to the effect that a "free gold market" (meaning virtually resumed gold payments on the currency) will be approved by the government "at the earliest date at which the state of the exchanges renders the course possible and desirable." For this remarkable movement of exchange on Europe, as for the equally notable movement of the prices for European securities, there was more than one visible reason. In so far as the abnormal premium on American exchange, in 1920 and 1921, the discount on European exchange at New York, measured the immense surplus of exports in the American foreign trade, the influence was disappearing. Taken together, December and January recorded the smallest excess of our merchandise exports over imports since the autumn of 1914.

January's export surplus, $63,000,000, compared with $446,000,000 in January of 1921. It was exceeded in the corresponding month of five out of the eight years which immediately preceded the war; in addition to which, Europe in January of 1922 was sending gold to the United States in amounts five to ten times as great as the import of the pre-war years. On the other hand, Great Britain's surplus of merchandise imports over exports fell during January actually to the smallest total of any month since August of 1913. The January import surplus was £4,890,000; the average monthly import surplus of the pre-war year was £11,000,000.

This great change in the balance of merchandise trade affected every European country. Whether it can or can not continue on its present scale, it conforms to the logic of a situation in which Europe owes prodigious sums on current account to America which it must mostly pay in goods. That it would reverse the downward movement of New York exchange on Europe was inevitable, always supposing a disastrous economic situation in Europe did not offset the improvement of its foreign trade through the flight of investment capital from Europe to America. But, as the bond market has shown, nothing of that kind is happening.

Instead of the capital of England and France and neutral Europe seeking refuge in the United States, American capital has been moving in large amounts into securities of the sound European countries. That has notoriously occurred during this present season, not only through subscription to new "dollar loans" offered by European governments on the New York market, but through extensive purchases on the markets of Europe itself. Such a movement is good evidence of the longer view which financial judgment is taking of the future of Europe, and it is certainly not unconnected also with the further reduction in the French and English war-time paper currencies, during the past few weeks, to the lowest totals since the armistice. Precisely as the changing balance of exports and imports means payment of Europe's current American indebtedness in goods, so this contraction of inflated paper means the narrowing of the percentage of depreciation and the gradual approach of a day when American drafts on a European bank will be paid by that bank in gold.

These evidences of European economic recovery were naturally welcome in the American market. They could affect only indirectly, however, the course of American industrial revival. Indeed, our decreasing exports, one of the factors in the recovery of Europe's economic equilibrium, were themselves a heavy handicap to our producing trades, and meantime the agricultural West continued, until a month or more of the new year had lapsed, to be sunk in the deepest of industrial depression. Wheat, which sold at Chicago for $1.80 per bushel a year ago and at $3 two years ago, had reached $1.03 toward the end of 1921. Corn, which brought $1.30 per bushel in January, 1920, and 76½ cents a bushel in January, 1921, had declined to 50 cents. For wheat this was distinctly a "pre-war price"; for corn it was lower than the midwinter price in the half-dozen years before 1914. Farmers and merchants agreed in the statement that these prices were well below actual cost of production under present conditions.

Yet the grain trade seemed to be wholly skeptical over the possibility of higher prices, and the farmers, under pressure of the banks to which they were heavily indebted, continued to throw their grain on a falling market. In February a change occurred. Starting with higher bids from European consuming countries, the price of wheat began to rise. From $1.07, at which it sold in the first month of the year, it advanced with such rapidity that by the opening of March it had reached $1.49½. Corn, as against its January price of 52 cents per bushel, had risen to 70. These were by far the highest prices paid since the present crop was harvested; they represented increase of 40 per cent. from the season's lowest for the grain remaining unsold on the farms—which usually, at this time of year, amounts to more than 150,000,000 bushels of wheat and more than 1,000,000,000 bushels of corn. The actual enhancement of market value for such an unsold surplus would figure out $270,000,000.

The reason for this rapid recovery was no mystery. It was not merely the decrease of half a million acres in the area of the newly-planted winter wheat crop; wheat sold around the dollar price for weeks after the government's acreage report had been published, in December. What actually happened was the discovery that the grain trade's earlier ideas of the whole world's grain yield of 1921 had been grossly exaggerated. It is true that France, England, Italy, and even Germany had increased their wheat production; between them these four countries raised 180,000,000 bushels more than in 1920. But with its gaze fixed on these European harvests, the grain market had overlooked the fact that India's wheat crop had decreased 121,000,000 bushels, to the smallest figure in a dozen years; that the United States had produced 40,000,000 bushels less than the year before, and, by no means least important in the reckoning, that the disastrous Russian famine had not only stopped shipments from that country to central Europe, but had drawn huge amounts from the grain reserves of the outside world.

Furthermore, with its mind chiefly impressed by the fall in the total value of our wheat exports during 1921, a consequence of lower prices, the grain trade had scarcely noticed that the actual quantity exported in that year was not only 60,000,000 bushels greater than in 1920, but actually the largest ever made in a single year—exceeding by 30 per cent. even the shipments of 1915, whose harvest was 200,000,000 bushels greater than last year's. When the yield of last autumn's crop was known, grain experts estimated that 250,000,000 bushels could be spared for export in the or autumn, events of significance began to happen, says Alexander Dana Noyes in Scribner's Magazine. In the economic field as elsewhere, the last month or two of winter is usually a time of financial inertia, of what may be called economic low vitality. This season it has been marked by several occurrences in financial and commercial markets which were not only striking in themselves, but foreshadowed a changing situation. Some of them embodied the resumption, with increasing emphasis, of movements which had got distinctly under way in the autumn months, but had subsided at the opening of the new year. Others represented absolute reversal of a previous drift of things. All of them raised extremely interesting questions regarding the economic future.

After its sudden advance toward the end of 1921, the investment bond market halted during January in what seemed a mood of indecision; but the pause was only preliminary to a new forward movement during the next six weeks, in a shape which may fairly be termed spectacular. The autumn rise of Liberty Bonds had not continued and there overbought position on the part of the public, possibly we may not expect anything more than the normal though at times sharp reactions that interfere with any real bull movement, unless, of course, some developments of peculiarly bearish character should serve to shake the confidence of those who have been accumulating stocks.

Continuance of very cheap time money naturally helps all investment issues, first bonds and then the better class of preferred stocks, to advance in price, and the surplus demand from investors will naturally flow into first-class common stocks and second and even third-rate bonds.

The idea that the bonus measure will pass and will in itself involve another period of Railroad reports announced so far this year have been striking in their disclosure of the ability of the several managements to curtail operating expenses sufficiently to permit of very largely increased net earnings, notwithstanding still rather unsatisfactory gross business.

Many conservative railroad heads who looked upon the situation pessimistically even a month or two ago are now acquiring new "hearts of hope," and in consequence we are seeing the gradual absorption of railway issues along with other evidences of further accumulation of the low-priced rails by those who believe that this year will mark the beginning of a big boom in that class of securities. Certainly so far as most low-priced railroad stocks are concerned, the earnings trend shows there are a great many dividend possibilities in this section of the list and in stocks that are selling even yet much lower than they have sold in former fairly bullish markets in rails when their dividend prospects were not as favorable as at present.

Ability to readily finance new enterprises is working in favor of the public utility group in general, and indeed in favor of almost everything there is on the list. Certainly the copper stocks have been going into strong hands in connection with the gradual absorption of the surplus, and the definite assumption that even the moderate resumption in copper-mining activities that is taking place will not be sufficient to meet any too well the copper requirements expected later in the year.

This ability to finance of course affects building operations of every sort, and in this way all the steel companies. It means, as well, that many concerns that seemed to be on the edge of receivership on occasions in the past may be permitted to stagger through their difficulties until they are on firm ground again. Mr. Morgan is quoted as having said in reference to the Mexican bond situation that any debtor who is honestly desirous of meeting his obligations should be given every opportunity to do so, and this would seem to apply, not only to the Mexican government and its outstanding foreign bonds, but also to industrial, railway, and other corporations which, while they may not have kept intact sufficient assets to cover the requirements of note issues, still are showing such ability in curtailing expenses and increasing their business as to mean that they are actually earning money again.—The Trader.

A vast reconstruction programme, the cost of which will exceed $300,000, has been undertaken by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in Stanislaus County. This work, intended to give improved service to this rapidly growing section, includes a new 60,000-volt line from Modesto to Hughson, new substations at Hughson, Turlock, and Riverbank, and the rebuilding of the switching and regulating equipment at the Modesto sub-station.

The transmission lines from Modesto to Hughson will be eight miles in length, connecting at Modesto with two separate circuits from Newman and Manteca. New 17,000-volt circuits will also be constructed to supply the territory in the vicinity of Hughson.

At Hughson a new station is to be built, consisting of two banks of transformers with a combined capacity of approximately 6000 horsepower. Improvement of the station grounds and permanent quarters for the operating force will also be built.

The present Turlock sub-station is to be replaced by a substantial reinforced concrete structure and the transformer capacity is to be increased from 1000 to 2700 horsepower.

The present Modesto switching equipment is to be removed and will be replaced by new and modern switches and regulators.

Riverbank has been chosen by the Santa Fé Railroad Company as the site of their new icing plant for stocking refrigerator cars. Over 600 horsepower in motors will be installed, necessitating a new sub-station to take care of this large demand.

School District No. 12 of Wallowa County, Oregon, includes within its boundaries the entire city of Wallowa and considerable adjacent territory. Wallowa is situated 350 miles east of Portland on the La Grande-Joseph branch of the Oregon-Washington Railroad and Navigation Company. Wallowa is a well-built city serving an extensive agricultural section. It has a large flour mill, creamery, three planing mills, sawmill, and box factory. Its water system is municipally owned. Wallowa County is situated in the extreme northeast corner of the state, has an area of 3169 square miles, and is a very important agricultural and stock-raising county.

of selected farm lands planted to grapes, deciduous fruits, and alfalfa, appraised by John C. Moore of Fresno at $724,600, or an average of $410 per acre.

Net income for the producing portion of the property for the past two years has averaged $73,818.65 per annum. This figure will be greatly increased from more than 600 acres of fruit which comes into bearing in 1923 and 1924.

The liberal sinking fund provision, the earnings which have been more than two and a half times interest charges, and the large margin of safety make these bonds very attractive. Furthermore, application has been made to certify them as a legal investment for California savings banks and the offering is contingent thereupon. At the price of 100 and interest to yield 7 per cent. these bonds will probably move out very rapidly.

inflation in prices generally should be ignored. That we will have fluctuations in prices of commodities in particular and in general goes without saying, but to expect the banking interests of the country to permit of any such inflation of prices as we saw a year or two ago would be to suggest that they were willing to cut loose the anchor of conservatism and sail the essentially unsafe waters of inflation once again.

After news of strikes comes generally news of negotiations for settlement and finally the actual ending. Consequently the market for textile stocks and for railroad securities and coal issues affected by current labor troubles would seem reasonable purchases on all the fair reactions that may come in the market until the time comes to discount the clearing of the labor skies.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

Despite all gloomy prognostications to the contrary, the novel continues to flourish and sometimes even appears to be more consequential than ever before. Some of the most important recent publications have been fiction; and the past week has been noteworthy in that it brought to the light of print a book that bids fair to outlive 99 per cent, of its contemporaries. "Vocations," we venture to say, will take its place among the few hundred English novels that one calls "classics" or "standard novels," according to whether he is of a worshipful or litote-esque frame of mind. "Vocations," whose author is the Irish novelist, Gerald O'Donovan (Boni & Live-right; $2), may or may not become a best seller. Many people seek in current fiction what Mr. Knopf so aptly calls the "literature of escape," and such are apt to pass up "Vocations" on the strength of its rather formidable flap-descriptions. For, for once, a publisher's description, so far from exaggerating the merits of its subject, does not even adequately rise to the occasion. But "Vocations" does bear on its face a letter of recommendation, a letter from George Moore, whose sympathy with the book, at once so like and so unlike his own work, can readily be imagined. Mr. Moore regrets that he has not time to "write a prodigiously favorable article about it." In lieu of that, he recommends it to its publisher and its public. I have quoted from Mr. George Moore for two reasons—first because his criticism of a book is not to be taken lightly, and second because of the analogy between "Vocations" and Mr. Moore's own books; though I hasten to add there is nothing of the nature of a "school" about "Vocations." It is a spontaneous and energetic growth, not a diffused inspiration from another man. If it does remind poignantly of "Mullin," probably Moore's most sincere and human novel, it is because both Mr. Moore and Mr. O'Donovan availed themselves of the same material, the genteel and semigenteel strata of Irish country life; and both approached it with a dispassionate determination to render it to the life and to demonstrate the unique drama that lurks in any society deeply imbued with church affiliations. In addition to the identity of their subject matter, both Gerald O'Donovan and George Moore have the clear cryptic idiom characteristic of good Irish style and familiar to the world at large through Bernard Shaw's dry elucidations.

So much for the sake of devotees of Moore: they are sure to delight in "Vocations." For the rest of the world—and I feel that I have a brief to bring "Vocations" to the attention of every one who appreciates literature—it may be added that Mr. O'Donovan has none of the sybaritic quality that ruins George Moore for persons of less hedonistic tendencies. If he lacks the golden tones and velvet surfaces of Moore, O'Donovan has nevertheless a compensating quality in that he is always healthy. "Vocations" is one of the sanest of books, despite a subject that would tempt the recording angel to sensationalism.

I hesitate to state the theme of Mr. O'Donovan's book for fear of frightening off those who eschew sensation and those whose feelings would be hurt. But briefly, it is an exposure of the irrationality of convent life, treated, however, with such tact and with such exquisitely good sense that not even the most devout religieuse could be wounded by its argument. Unlike most thematic novels, the theme is consistent and persistent, but is so identical with the dramatic interest of the book that there is nowhere the effect of a plot concocted to camouflage a sermon.

For the rest "Vocations" is a charming novel, and so engrossing that it is practically impossible to part with it before following it to its eminently satisfactory conclusion.

Carl Van Vechten has written a very curious book which defies classification as to form and which contains an essence of pagan amorality combined with an almost stoical sincerity. It is a commonplace that critics read into books elements their author did not put in; and it is possible that Mr. Van Vechten has purposed in "Peter Whiffle" (Knopf; $2.50) nothing more alarming than a quaint and rather harmlessly naughty story. Or he may have done exactly what he purports to do and written the true biography of a friend. Whether Peter Whiffle himself ever existed or not, certainly many of the people that appear here did and do. We recognize most of them and in fact many appear under their own names. But the interesting point is that "Peter Whiffle" is not merely a superficially charming chronicle. Peter himself, decadent and slacker and hedonist that he was, whose only practical virtue was his decorative personality, had stumbled on a great truth. Truth itself is an illusion, since nothing is static and truth implies permanency. This not precisely original discovery of Peter's is made the working hypothesis of his life and of Mr. Van Vechten's book. Peter's other great idea was that books are not worth the writing—a rather interesting theory which we wish more incipient authors would be bitten with before they became authors in fact.

Getting away from the deeply philosophical and historical interest of "Peter Whiffle," which I strongly suspect of being happy coincidences, Mr. Van Vechten has written a delightfully amusing history that is like nothing else under the sun. R. G.

Notes of Books and Authors.

"The Amateur's Book of the Dahlia," which Doubleday, Page & Co. published on March 24th, is a record of the experiences and experiments of Mrs. Charles H. Stout, known to all gardeners as one of the most successful amateur dahlia growers in the United States and the winner of many medals for her famous dahlias the Emily D. Renwick, Gertrude Dahl, J. Harrison Dick, and many others. The study of Mrs. Stout's favorite flower deals with all phases of dahlia culture, from pursuit of dahlias old and new to the latest developments of hybridizing. The book is so comprehensive that the editor of the Garden Magazine says it will obviate the necessity of writing another book on the subject for at least ten years.

The highest price ever paid for a single edition of any author's work was recorded when Gabriel Wells, a dealer in rare books, paid upward of $200,000 for a new definitive de luxe edition of Mark Twain. The sale of the de luxe edition was made by P. F. Collier & Son Company, who sell the Mark Twain sets. Harper & Brothers, who publish all of Mark Twain's works, arranged for this extraordinary edition with Albert Bigelow Paine, the great humorist's official biographer.

Hamlin Garland, whose works the Harpers will bring out in a uniform edition in May, is planning to take his wife and two daughters to London shortly. He will pass six months there on the "back trail" of the Garlands and McClintocks, giving himself over to the task of seeing England and getting in touch with what is being done by the younger writers. When he returns in autumn his nineteen-year-old daughter, Mary Isabel, will share the lecture platform with him.

Sir Gerald Du Maurier is said to be very busy working on the production of Macdonald Hastings' dramatic version of "If Winter Comes." Cyril Maude has obtained the American rights of the play.

It has been recently pointed out with reference to "What's What in the Labor Movement," by Waldo R. Brown, that many labor terms are of foreign origin, Swedish, Dutch, Indian, French, and that a dictionary of labor terms, such as the above, is necessary to intelligent comprehension of labor terminology.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

American History.

An attractive "History of the United States," by Wilbur Fiske Gordy, is suitable for seventh or eighth grade study. The book is published to stand the strain of hard wear and is lavishly illustrated with reproductions from historical paintings in color and with innumerable black and white cuts. It is adequately supplied with maps. Mr. Gordy has treated his material with a dramatic simplicity that is sure to arouse the historic interest of young students. The book has the further merit of being up to date—it takes its narrative through the year 1921, including, of course, a history of the arms conference.

Another history, which is rather of the high school variety, or which makes a satisfactory reference book for the average reader, is "American History and Government," by Matthew Page Andrews. As its title indicates, it is more particularly a political history and is therefore more interesting to the mature reader than the average history textbook. The author explains in his preface that his object is to interpret history rather than to record it.

The Prisoners of Hartling.

Mr. Beresford has written an extremely readable yarn of a more or less improbable character and has produced a very polished piece of work, beautifully put together and smooth of surface. That is as much as one can say for "The Prisoners of Hartling," despite the fact that it is second best seller or something of the sort in England. Was it

Disraeli said that agriculture and politics are the only essential ingredients of the English novel? "The Prisoners of Hartling" rises to one-half of that recipe in that it is a story of English country house life and of country sports. But the charming environment of Hartling is all the reward we found for sharing the imprisonment of its inmates. Mr. Beresford's error from our viewpoint is in having lit, however unfortunately, on an elaborate and rather unusual plot, to the unfolding of which all other interest is sacrificed. This method of procedure is only excusable in an avowed mystery or confessed detective story. In a serious novel it is inexcusable to invite your reader to a game of being baffled, to put him on guard that he must follow every clue you give him and seize every clue you drop, however casually. We are free to confess that a novel of plot bores us, and in our present mood would like to declare that no great novel ever had a complicated or odd plot. At least, it is a bad beginning and it takes a very great man to live it down. The novel of giddy gothic design should have the rest of the Dickens equipment of fantasia—of gargoyle decorations and rococo style.

Two Juvenile Books.

A nature book for children from six to ten is "The Little People of the Garden," by Ruth O. Dyer. The information, which is scientifically accurate, is presented in a form that will attract even the youngest children. Miss Dyer has here set forth the lives and habits of bees, ants, earthworms, frogs, and the other small fauna of the garden in story form that will appeal to all youngsters.

The same publishers have simultaneously issued an attractive book for growing girls—"Peggy Pretend," by Millicent Evison. This is the sort of tale of old-time Southern tradition that the girl of boarding-school age delights in. The Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company is to be commended for its charming publications for children.

About Radium.

Why is radium the most expensive substance in the world? queries the Manchester Guardian. Lecturing on radio-activity before the Royal Institution, Sir Ernest Rutherford gave much interesting information in answer to this question. He stated that the most important source of radium is a mineral named carnotite, which occurs in America in Colorado and Utah. On an average 5000 tons of rock have to be dealt with to obtain 500 tons of carnotite, and these 500 tons of selected ore only contain about fifty to 100 pounds of material containing radium, which then has to be carefully treated to get the precious grains of radium out of it.

The other important source of radium is pitch-blende, but in order to represent the actual amount of radium in a ton of it, one would have to represent one ton of pitch-blende by a line on a diagram stretching from London to Edinburgh, and on this scale the radium would then be represented by a line only four inches long. Pitch-blende, which is found in various parts of the world, is a curious conglomeration of a large number of elements, and Sir Ernest Rutherford remarked that he had heard it suggested that when the Creator got tired of creating the elements He dumped the rest into pitch-blende.

The lecturer went on to mention that the output of the radium was very small owing to the vast masses of rock that had to be dealt with in order to secure a few grains of this precious substance. In fact, the output to date of radium in Europe and America was only forty and 130 grammes respectively, giving a total world output up to the present of about 170 grammes, or approximately five and a half ounces. This would not be overweight if posted in an envelope with four penny stamps on it. The total value of this five and a half ounces of radium is from £3,250,000 to £4,750,000, or, roughly, £1,000,000 per ounce.

The world needs a system of taxation that will take it away from the taxpayer and leave him with just as much as he had before.

THE KREISLER RECITAL.

It seemed during the recent opera season that the public had quite definitely tabooed the upstairs side seats in the Exposition Auditorium, so extensive was the spread of unoccupied territory. But give the music-lovers of San Francisco such an artist to listen to as Kreisler, and they will submerge the farthest reaches of the vast auditorium beneath a sea of human beings. There were empty seats here and there last Sunday, but none of those stretches of vacant space that make the heart of the impresario sad. No doubt it was a record for a violin recital, for nine thousand is the figure that has been mentioned as covering the number present, and my observation would bear that out.

Kreisler made a deep impression on San Franciscans at his earlier recitals, and later visits of world-famous and unusually gifted geniuses such as Heifitz, Mischa Elman, and other violinists have not lessened it. To many Kreisler seems the king of them all. The reposeful dignity and mental and physical poise with which he faces a vast audience such as that of last Sunday night cause the unthinking to fear that he is not dowered with the sensitive temperament that would enable him to sway the emotions of his listeners. But that calm, controlled demeanor means depths and depths of strength in reserve.

His first attack is immediately reassuring; so easy, so sure, so brilliantly expressive, so full of the undertones and overtones of life are the strains he draws from his bow that simultaneously the mind is stimulated and the emotions stirred.

He gave the famous Kreutzer Sonata first—no light feat for a violinist to begin his recital with—and led his dazzled listeners on by graduated stages to the tremendous crescendo of the last movement.

Following came the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, in which the magic bow of this supreme master of subtly emotional tone seemed to weave new meanings. Meltingly sweet, a marvel of yearning loveliness, was the appassionato movement, and when the player reached the third movement with its amazing dance of the bow over flashing notes that came in a glittering shower, but never jostled each other, there were murmurings and subdued outcries of amazement and delight from the rapt audience.

Kreisler gave his listeners variety in the last group. There was the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Hymn to the Sun," Schubert's ballet music from "Rosamunde," and Cyril Scott's "Lotus Land," a piece in which Carl Lamson, the sympathetic accompanist, joined with the violinist in weaving tones full of fairy-like fantasy.

"La Gitana" and the famous "Caprice Viennois" closed—or tried to—the programme, both Kreisler's own compositions. They say an artist never stands still, and to take a single composition—"La Gitana"—one perceives the truth of the saying. Perhaps it is because of the terrible emotions that Kreisler, in common with many artists in his country, lived through during the war, but in this composition of his own, which Kreisler plays with so much love, he displayed an even more profound conception, and a proportionate ability to express it, of that truth which puzzles the too literal nature, that joy and sadness are closely allied, and never can they be wholly removed one from the other.

The audience, as is always the case with "Caprice Viennois," was charmed by the almost unbelievable mingling of swiftness, sureness, delicacy, and flashing brilliancy with which Kreisler handles his bow in this piece. It expresses a delightful mood of subtly compounded elements scarcely analyzable, although the preponderant element is joy. It always exhilarates Kreisler's hearers, and when this number—the last on the programme—was completed, the throng in the further stretches of the vast level poured forward almost as if drawn by a magnet, filling every available space about the platform as they gazed earnestly upon the features of the artist, almost as if they feared he would never return.

Once there it was impossible to move them. They sued for an encore and got it; for another, and got that. No doubt even that supple yet steely right arm of Kreisler's was tired, but, with no evidence of fatigue, he played yet again. But they were insatiable; even past the limits of proper consideration. But the only way to start the immense throng homewards was to begin a gradual extinction of the lights; so that finally they moved slowly and reluctantly away.

AT THE ORPHEUM.

There is no press agent's bluff in calling it an all-star bill at the Orpheum this week. In fact there are evidences of prosperity in the Orpheum Circuit even in these calamitous times, when New York theatres are perpetually going dark. But the Jim Corbett-Billy Van act of last week was, according to all accounts, a $2000-a-week attraction, Billy Van being a fifteen-hundred-dollar man and Jim Corbett drawing five hundred dollars weekly.

This week they have a tremendous headliner in the "Juliet and Romeo" piece, with Miss Josephine Victor, the rising young Shakespearean actress, as star. It sounds as if it might be too high-browish for a vaudeville audience, but not a bit of it. The audience listens devoutly, with no bewraying coughs to break the stillness, for their romantic sensibilities are keenly and pleasurably affected, and though the comedy is delicate it is wholly comprehensible, for it bears upon feminine complexities and professional jealousy.

Miss Victor is a delightful actress. As Juliet, when she descended from the bier, her movements had the poetic grace due to Shakespearean tragedy. And in the later phases, when Juliet becomes a star actress behind the scenes, she is a modern woman; a bewitching creature, all compounded of sudden, flashing changes of mood; pretty, piquant, money-voiced, irresistible.

And how beautifully, how appropriately, she is gowned! It was a queer sensation to feel ourselves thus suddenly propelled into the Montague-Capulet tragedy. Imagination immediately began to work, and we found ourselves murmuring involuntarily,

For here lies Juliet, and her beauty makes This vault a feasting presence full of light.

Juliet's beautiful grave-robe, and the gestures and movements of the graceful woman in it, were as poetically appropriate as were the irresistible charm and dainty modishness of the bewitching creature later in her glimmering frock, chic and modern. And then, suddenly, we found ourselves confronting the familiar tragedy of the player. The fading of youth, beauty, and charm, the coming of age, the passing of prestige, professional extinction. All this does not happen to Juliet, but her spoiled, petted perceptions of life brush against another's tragedy, and a realization of what is really important in life comes to the petted star.

Thus it may be seen that there is very much in the play, and that romance, comedy, tragedy, and the untheatrical truths of life by turns project themselves upon the ever sympathetic consciousness.

The play is by Harry Wagstaff Gribble, and Miss Victor is supported by an excellent company. Hartley Power is a handsome and capable leading man, and Marie Falls, John Costello, and George Stanley provide good support.

Bert Howard, "the man with the piano," is a genuine humorist and an intimate friend of the piano keys. He gives an enormously enjoyable Gallic impersonation, monologues breezily between stunts, and keeps the audience on the steady, delighted grin when it isn't roaring. He fools with the piano, admonishes it, capers over and under it, plays jokes with its compliant keys, which seem to grin delightedly at him, entering into the joke when he shakes a reproving finger at them. In fact, Bert is a cute old thingum.

Another starry act is that entitled "The Star Boarder," in which James Silver gives a very taking representation of an ancient rube of a simple nature and with a youthful heart. Mr. Silver revives dear old Yankee intonations which our smart modernness and the tendency to eliminate sectional distinctiveness are gradually eradicating. His old landlord might have come out of the pages of Oliver Wendell Holmes' novels, which, probably, are no longer read, but which contain the most delightfully humorous yet truthful sketches of Yankee character.

"The Star Boarder" features also George Kirby, a long-legged youth who can act comedy and sing sentiment, and Helen Duval serves as a neat little interlocutor with the two comedians.

In "A Racy Conversation" two men spar amusingly, Basil Lynn giving a very good take-off of a monocled Britisher with an asthmatic cough, while William Smythe sings ballads in a mellow voice and serves as a feeder to the other's comedy.

"Dainty Marie" is on this week in her familiar act. Few women in vaudeville wear a more revealing costume than "Dainty Marie," who has a very pretty figure and doesn't care who knows it. But somehow her matter-of-factness, and a kind of wholesomeness of type enables her to carry it off. The audience always enjoys her act, and the changing spectacle of her pretty figure in its white fleshings making startling acrobatic silhouettes against the dark background gives it a series of enjoyable sensations. Marie Meeker—as her full name is given—gives her usual casual monologues as she evolves on the rings, dropping casual jokelets in an occasional casual lisp, and showing that she always remains a favorite.

George Ford and Flo Cunningham entertain with male and female patter, George Ford throwing in a funny imitation or so, and both dancing. In the prolonged controversy as to whether or not the pair are married they have hit on an idea which keeps the audience well amused.

Alex Patty does upside-down balancing skillfully, and eats, juggles, and plays the violin while standing on his head; clever, but too suggestive of prolonged physical discomfort.

The only left-over is the William Seabury dancing act, which is very good of its kind, and so handsomely, tastefully, and elaborately mounted that we rather suspect William of having engaged a genuine and expensive artist to design the handsome sets and costumes.

Mr. Seabury, indeed, sets out to gratify the eye only. He speaks sloppily, the Oriental pianist who plays so well enunciates like an untrained schoolboy, and the girls just give

A New Water Era

Coöperating with the City according to a plan outlined in a decision of the Railroad Commission, Spring Valley Water Company is engaged in adding 24 million gallons daily to your water supply.

The present capacity is 42 million gallons daily; the yield of the sources of supply will be 66 M.G.D. when the work under way is completed. San Francisco will overcome the topographical difficulty of her situation on a semi-arid peninsula with negligible local sources of supply. There will be abundant water for all purposes, including greater residential facilities and industrial expansion.

The addition of 24 M.G.D. to your water supply will come from Calaveras Reservoir in southern Alameda County. Spring Valley will bring the water down Niles Canyon and to Irvington; thence it will flow through the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, crossing lower San Francisco Bay and emptying into Crystal Springs storage reservoir in San Mateo County.

While the City is constructing the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, Spring Valley will increase the height of Calaveras Dam and build a conduit to Irvington. Both parts of the unified project will be finished at the same time.

Spring Valley will pay the City interest during construction on the cost of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, and for its use, some $250,000 a year.

All this is the result of a Railroad Commission order made in August, 1921, and of an agreement reached by the City and the Company, finally authorized by unanimous vote of the Supervisors in March of this year, and approved by the Railroad Commission.

A new era of development has dawned for our City.

CHAUNCEY OLCOTT.

Chauncey Olcott has a public of his own. There must be something lovable in the man, for out in front there are quantities of people drawn to see him who not only enjoy his acting and singing, but who have a strong personal regard for him, and waft great gusts of friendly affection across the footlights with every handclap.

Olcott's special kind of art is a survival, and as such no longer belongs to our time. But it is cherished all the more because it has become uncommon by those who remain faithful to it.

This special form of dramatic art was developed by Dion Boucicault, for those broths of boys that Olcott plays are direct descendants of Conn the Shaughran and all the rest of them.

However, the comedy offered by Olcott is of a more retiring type. Sentiment is his forte, his light but still sweet and mellow singing voice aiding him in expressing the character of a tuneful vagabond whose lyrics soften the hearts of the countryside and win their liking.

Rida Johnson Young, in collaboration with Rita Olcott, wrote "Ragged Robin" for Mr. Olcott, the piece itself being also a survival, and curiously, successfully old-fashioned in flavor. It might easily pass for having been written thirty or forty years ago.

There is a fairy element in it—the play is located in Ireland in the year 1830—and "the good little people" are seen at their revels, a pretty queen of the magic well showing in her glimmering, jeweled greenness above the well top.

There are brogues to burn in "Ragged Robin," that of Josie Chafin being particularly native in flavor. Ethel Intropidi does not attempt, or only partly, the Irish brogue, but she is something like an old-fashioned flower growing in a peasant's cottage garden, and pleases us in the rôle of Irish Margaret Grattan. There are over a dozen more in the cast, James A. Bliss helping in the comedy, and several picturesquely attired figures—that of the father, for instance—aiding to bring back the old, almost lost atmosphere.

Chauncey Olcott himself belongs only in that atmosphere. I shouldn't wonder if he really believes in fairies; there is something innocent and unworldly in his countenance which helps him to retain a flavor of its vanishing youth; and he no doubt long since persuaded himself that this superficial art which he expresses is the real thing.

At any rate he sings and acts it convincingly to those who still love it, and there are plenty of them, for a large and extremely affectionate audience was assembled to greet him on his opening night, to hang on his accents, and to call lustily, as he stood before the curtain bowered in welcoming blooms, for their favorite songs.

These demands Mr. Olcott yielded to with a heart and a half. But he is not niggardly with his audience in any sense, having selected an appropriately endowed company for the numerous cast, and dressed the play in the prettiest and most fitting of costumes. For the blooming garden around Andrew Grattan's home was a place of beauty, careful settings had been devised for the woods and the bog where the fairies met, and the interiors were all in full suggestion of an olden time when hard wood gave a mellow frame-work to picturesquely brown and wooing interiors.

The Orpheum Next Week.

The Doris Humphreys Dancers, a sextet, until recently were unknown. Unheralded they came to New York, and the morning after their first performance they were the talk of the town.

Lucas and Francis are spoofing the vamps in a skit called "Vampires and Fools." Mr. Lucas and his associates make this a high light of fun.

The slogan of the Three Musketeers of literary fame was "one for all and all for one." Pretty Peggy Parker, who until this season shared vaudeville honors with Eddie Buzzell, has produced a musicallette called "The Four Musketeers," and their slogan is "fun for all and all for fun." While Miss Parker is a charming little comedienne, she is also a good vocalist and a very pleasing and attractive dancer. Her songs are in a comedy vein, and they entitle her to distinction as a singer. Her assistants are a male quartet, four modern knights of "The House of Entertainment."

Fred Fenton and Sammy Fields offer a bit of a surprise which they call "Appearing in Person," and to reserve this surprise for their auditors, nothing is said of what they do in advance. "Appearing in Person," however, is probably the brightest thing they have offered and considering their past efforts, this is saying a great deal.

The Haley Sisters are among the most talented of those who follow the footlights to fame. Recently they created a furor in musical comedy and were featured with "His Little Widow." These girls possess all the requirements of a superfine organization.

Greene and Barstow in their "Novelty Diversion" have an offering which has an entirely different vaudeville idea.

Miss Josephine Victor and her company of players in "Juliet and Romeo," and Basil Lynn and William Smythe in their "Racey Conversation" will remain to delight audiences for a second week.

The Columbia Theatre.

Chauncey Olcott in "Ragged Robin" will be at the Columbia Theatre for a second and final week commencing with Sunday night, April 23d. Olcott's lyric voice has lost none of its charm for his followers, and he is delighting them with "Sweet Girl of My Dreams," "I Used to Believe in the Fairies," "Click of Her Little Brogues," and "When."

"Ragged Robin" is a play of Irish romance and fairy lore from the pen of Rida Johnson Young and Rita Olcott, and the cast presenting it in support of the star gives a superior performance. Matinees are Wednesday and Saturday.

Henry Miller and Blanche Bates are coming to the Columbia Theatre for about five weeks to present two or three new comedies never tried in this country. On Monday night, May 1st, they will appear in the first of these, "Her Friend the King," by A. E. Thomas and Harrison Rhodes. "Her Friend the King" is based on a successful novel entitled "High Life," by Mr. Rhodes. With the Miller-Bates organization is Miss Ruth Chatterton, last seen here in J. M. Barrie's "Mary Rose" and for two special matinees in "Into the Sunlight."

Vaudeville Artists' Benefit.

The Orpheum Theatre will donate to the insurance fund of the National Vaudeville Artists the gross receipts from the matinee of Friday, April 21st. Over 600 theatres in the United States and Canada joined in this benefit, which is a yearly event. The National Vaudeville Artists is an organization with a membership of over 12,000, all artists of the vaudeville stage. The proceeds of the "testimonial matinee" will go into a fund which will provide every member of the National Vaudeville Artists with an insurance policy of $1000, payable immediately to the family upon the member's decease. Charitable contributions are not solicited from the public.

The Wednesday evening darkness of Charlotte, Iowa, since the failure of the Great Feministic Movement there, and the execution of the sentence of banishment on bachelors, sequent upon that failure, has its counterpart in London, where the effort to jazz up the town on the American plan suggested by the Indiana girl reporter has tumbled to the ground and smashed itself to bits. The Londoners refuse to stop burning coal and choking their chimneys and their throats and their atmosphere with soot. They seem wedded to their "London Particulars," as they call their beloved fogs, and prefer outer darkness to freezing to death in the interest of making their city the "magnet of the world." Likewise they will not condemn their railway depots and build new, and they will persist in their peculiar and offensive virtue of closing their public houses at a certain time every night, which is the height of English respectability. One of the Mishavaka young lady's suggestions to the Londoners was to have good restaurants. They refuse; or it is too much trouble; or they entertain the delusion that those they now have are good enough. They purpose to cling to their "weal-an'-am" pie, which would sink a walrus in the sea, and their Yorkshire puddin', which would do to sole shoes, and their soft-boiled fish smothered in kite paste. They may be reduced to second place in point of population, or even to fifth if necessary, but they will not learn to cook. So a great many New Yorkers this year are going to remain in New York, and a great many Parisians are going to remain in Paris, and the sea-coal fogs are going to remain in London. Meanwhile the Indiana girl's advice is as good as it ever was, and as good as most advice, which requires to be taken in order to cure. And meanwhile, also, those that love London love it as it is and will continue so to do; just as those that love Carmel-by-the-Sea love that as it is, and wish to "keep it off the map." It is a good deal like the taste for pineapple pie. If you like pineapple pie, why that's the way you are, and there's nothing to be done about it.

Viscount Lascelle's sword might do henceforth for a shake frob, but as a weapon it is probably out of business for good. Princess Mary used it at the wedding breakfast to cut a London wedding cake. We need no further account of its condition. It is ruined. No temper of Damascus could emerge from such a test other than a bent and hacked-up thing, unfit for further service except splitting shakes, or perhaps taking up carpets. Prince Henry offered to get a hatchet, but the bride, with that pretty persistence in destruction which sometimes impels the sweetest of women to dig out a jammed wash-bowl plug with her husband's razor, rejected it and sacrificed the sword. Anticipating the wreckage that was about to ensue, the Duke of York suggested a Lewis gun for the job, but the lady went ahead, and strewed the plain with crumbs and chips. The devastation must have been awful. We can think of but one parallel to that chaotic scene, and that occurred when J. D. Galloway returned from overseas, where he had been serving as a major, and was made to carve a cake at a certain club dinner. He fell upon that cake as though it had been a platoon of Prussians, and soon had it beaten, butchered, routed and dispersed all over his end of the table. Whereupon O. K. Cushing remarked: "I understand for the first time in my life what is meant by the old phrase 'the officer's mess.'"

Roswell Miller was well off in his own right, and he did not materially impoverish himself when he married the only daughter of the late Andrew Carnegie. He might have spent his life in sport, travel, or the inanities of what is called society, or he might have become a cog in the wheel of a big business organization, but he preferred to be an instructor of engineering in New York University. Like the case of the man that was in love with his own wife, that is perfectly legal. We hope he can teach. There never will be too many teachers that can teach, just as there never can be too few of the sort that can not. But that his good example will be of much value to other rich young men, which has been claimed for him, is open to serious doubt. Rich men have their own ways of looking at things, and young men seldom notice the good examples all about them. Rich men that have grown old working are likely to continue the habit, not from necessity or altruistic urge, but because they never cultivated any time-wasting virtues; and among young men, rich or poor, those that really like to work are about as rare as feathers on a sheep. Most of them that work at all do so because they have to, and would anyhow through recognition of necessity; not because some millionaire sets them a good example. Those that are improvident, or unambitious, and do not care to work, can not be made to by the example of somebody who frankly does it because he likes to and not because he must. If they were in his place they would not, and that is all there is to it. The power of example has been vastly overrated—that is, of good example. The world is a hive of industry, but that is owing to necessity, not choice. The general disposition is to sit down on the shore, like the Kanaka, and watch the waves work. And we'll never get over it. Any socialistic régime that proposes to remove the spur of poverty or even blunt its rowels proposes its own early dissolution. The normal man is a loafer, with his eye peeled for a pretty ankle. That's why women shortened their skirts.

The doctrine of self-determination has caused much confusion in Europe, especially among the little states recently released by the war from the domination and tyranny of Austria. It appears to have been taken too seriously by too many persons. Among others are the typists and stenographers in the civil service of Czechoslovakia. They wish to be self-determining, and with President Wilson's friend at the head of the government saw no reason to suspect that they were not. President Masaryk seemed to be at one with the Wilson administration on this theory of what was good for mankind, and no question had been raised as to any possible limitations or restraints upon its application to womankind. Suddenly the whole female part of the civil service is electrified most unpleasantly by an edict in derogation of personal liberty and self-determination in dress. Girls in the government employ are to appear henceforth in string blouses "closed up to the neck." Why? Why, in the name of liberty, shall women be constrained to apparel approved by some dry-as-dust old fussy official? Shall their first and deepest instinct be warped and perverted by some amateur bureaucrat who measures efficiency by the chips whittled from the office lead pencils? Self-determination forbid! Better the ghosts that once "beleaguered the walls of Prague" (although we forget why they did it) than these animated mummies with no thought for the charms of the office flapper—or perhaps too much. Life in Vienna was never thus; nor life in Paris. And if it is to be so strait-laced in Prague, what is to become of Bohemia?

The dry-as-dusts are now taking account of the exact amount of thrill that may be conveyed by a soul kiss. They do it, or propose to do it, by some mechanical device akin to the air pump and deflated tire with which the physician takes your blood pressure. Such, at least, is the latest story from New York. If the kiss is of the soul variety, the dial will register one set of statistics. If it is merely of the stage type, another value shows. One wonders what would happen if one party to the tested osculation delivered a soul kiss and the other a stage kiss—probably it would bust the dern machine wide open.

Feminine Discontent.

The young Englishwomen who are now admitted to the University of Oxford with the same rights as the men have formulated some complaints against their male classmates. They are too polite!

They rush to open doors when a girl wants to enter or leave the room.

If the girls are late at lectures they rise to offer them their seats.

"All this is unbearable," declare the women students. "These excessive gallantries on the part of these gentlemen are intended to give us to understand that they do not consider us their equals."

"It is perhaps true," observes Le Petit Parisien. "But what is also so is that if the Oxford students were not to lavish on their women comrades those marks of courtesy the latter, with a pout of contempt, would say: 'Lord, how rude these young men are!'"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A post-war French story of hotel exigencies is as follows: A motorer through Touraine complained at petit déjeuner about his coffee. It did not taste like coffee. He told the waiter, "It has a kind of cocoa taste." The waiter smelled and sampled the beverage. He was covered with contrition. "I'm sorry, sir. A most unfortunate mistake. I've brought you tea."

A young lawyer wrote a prominent practitioner in Dallas, Texas, asking what chance there was for a man of his stamp in that section. "I am a Republican in politics," he wrote, "and I am an honest man." The great Texan wrote back, "If you are an honest lawyer you will have no competition here, and as you are a Republican, the game laws will protect you."

The cold spell has brought the usual advice not to sit over a fire, but to harden oneself in the open air in order to keep warm. The most admirable of the hardening school was a former Cameron of Lochiel. When bivouacking with his son in the depths of winter Cameron noticed that the boy had rolled a snowball to make a pillow. Immediately he kicked it away. "No effeminacy, boy!" he commanded, sternly.

In these days, when England is overrun by the proletariat, anything may happen. The English waiter, always a professional snob, has lost some of his old-time finesse. A profiteer was lunching at Claridge's the other day, and preparatory to the ordeal had knotted his napkin about his neck. The waiter hurried forward with a wink to the more knowing patrons and inquired in a carrying voice, "Haircut or shave, sir?"

On one of Mr. Lincoln's trips to army headquarters in the "Wilderness," accompanied by Noah Brooks, he was driven over the corduroy road in a six-mule army wagon by a very profane driver. Mr. Lincoln stood it as long as he could, then touching the driver on his shoulder inquired, "My friend, aren't you an Episcopalian?" "Yes," was the gruff reply. "I thought so. You swear like Seward, and he's a church warden up in Syracuse."

On the occasion of her hundredth birthday the village centenarian received a visit from the vicar. Being anxious to hear from her own lips what she considered had been the source of her strength and sustenance, he said: "My dear Mrs. Adams, pray tell me, in order that I may tell to others, what has been the secret of your longevity?" The vicar waited with unusual eagerness for the old lady's reply, but he was hardly prepared for it when it came. "Victuals!" she answered.

A Pittsburgh bellboy is credited with an ingenious method for calling sleepy guests. A man leaving instructions to be called early is awakened on the following morning with a loud tattoo on the door. In answer to the sleepy guest's inquiry the bellhop answers, "I have a message for you, sir." The usual reaction is for the sleepy one to jump, however reluctantly, out of bed, stumblingly reach the door, and grab the envelope tendered him. The message, of course, reads, "It is time to get up."

Ben Turpin's press agent is said to be responsible for a story that the comedian's admirers enjoy, whether it is true or not. Turpin approached the teller of a strange bank with a check to be cashed. The teller did not recognize him. Such is fame! "Have you any way to identify yourself?" asked the non-movie-attending teller. "Sure," replied Ben, and he became cross-eyed and did his great film fall. "Now, do you know me?" he asked confidently. "No," answered the teller, "but here's your money. You have earned it."

A story, brought back a few years ago from Peking, gives as clear a picture as may be found of how arrogant, armed nations have bulldozed and despoiled big docile China. There was a Yankee seeking a concession in China either to build a railroad or work a mine, and he was summoned before some gorgeously-robed Chinese officials. On a table in front of them lay a crazy-quilt map of China—in many colors. Behind the chairs of the Chinese officials stood agents of various foreign governments. "I will do this work here," said the American, pointing to a red spot on the map. "I'm sorry," spoke up the agent of John Bull, "but the red part of China belongs to Great Britain." "We'll sink our money over here, then," affirmed the Yankee, indicating a splotch of blue. But another foreign gentleman objected. "The blue section of the map," he said, "is German." So it went. This section of the map was Japanese; that was preempted by some other power. Finally, his patience exhausted, the American turned to the Chinese officials and asked: "Where the hell is China, anyway?"

In answer to a letter from his bank calling his loan, a wealthy California rancher wrote this letter: "For the following reasons I am unable to send you the check asked for: I have been held up, held down, sandbagged, walked on, flattened out, and squeezed dry, first by the government, state, and county, for Federal war tax, excess profit tax, merchant's license and auto tax, and then by every society and organization that the inventive mind can invent to extract what I may or may not possess. I have contributed to the Society of John the Baptist, the G. A. R., K. of C., X. Y. Z., the Woman's Relief, the Navy League, the Red Cross, the Purple Cross, the Double Cross, the Y. M. C. A., the Boy Scouts, the Jewish Relief and every hospital in town. Then on top of it all came the Associated Charities and the Society for the Suppression of Useless Giving. The government has so governed my business that I don't know who owns it, I am inspected, suspected, examined, reexamined, informed, required and commanded, so I don't know who I am, where I am, or why I am. All I know is that I am supposed to be an inexhaustible supply of money for every known need, desire, or hope of the human race; and because I will not sell all I have and go out and beg, borrow, and steal money to give away, I have been cursed, discussed, boycotted, talked to, talked about, lied to, lied about, held up, hung up and robbed. And the only reason I am clinging to life is to see what in Hell is coming next."

THE MERRY MUSE.

The Dining-Room Gallery

What dining-room would be complete Without the English country seat. Our appetites with pleasure whetting, To baying hounds and chairs upsetting.

The drooping fowl upon the wall Is fraught with great appeal to all. No wonder it makes such demand Upon our salivary gland.

And then the ever-present fish Inanimate upon the dish, Has scaled the heights of popularity With undisputed solidarity.

But most of all I like the fruit Depicted by the mind astute, Who knows our interest to heighten Expecting daily it will ripen.

I think the final choice will be A portrait sketch of Burgundy, Extinct in hotel and emporium, With wreath entitled—In Memoriam.

Future of Education.

The future of education in England turns more on the treatment of the teacher than on anything else. Learning holds its head much higher in Ireland and in Scotland than in England, says the Nation and the Athenaeum. An Irishman respects the teacher because he respects learning as one of the spiritual mysteries, and in paying his respect the Irishman acknowledges the claims of a spiritual life. In Scotland the teacher represents an aspect of life that has been invested with importance and authority ever since the days of John Knox. In England all the traditions are the other way. The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries put education in its place as the servant of social and industrial power. The prevailing idea of the eighteenth century was that a small class should be educated on the lines proper for a gentleman, and the persons who did the work of education were like a superior type of domestic servant. In the case of the universities and public schools this standard was corrected in the nineteenth century as a result of the Liberal movement that reinvigorated public school education and set up the civil service. But nobody who has had much to do with the management of secondary schools is unaware of the appalling extent to which this spirit survives in the authorities who control the grammar schools, and the scandalous salaries that were paid until a year or two ago in these schools were its natural expression.

Things, like persons, Figaro philosophizes, suffer strange turns of fate. Expecting the world war to last a long time, the American administration contracted for enormous quantities of cloth for soldiers' uniforms. But, happily, the war came to a more speedy end than had been anticipated. In consequence, great quantities of the fabric which was to have clothed the gallant doughboys were thrown upon the market and were purchased by a French concern—for lining for the taxicabs of Paris!

Mrs. Anne Royall was the first woman journalist. She was a great nuisance around Washington for many years and narrowly escaped being ducked, under an old law, as a common scold.

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Affairs at the Whitecomb.

Cards have been issued by the Hotel Whitecomb announcing two formal events for the roof garden to take place during May. On Tuesday afternoon, May 2d, a bridge-luncheon will be arranged by the hotel, for which reservations are now being made, and on Tuesday, May 16th, a bridge-tea will be given.

Bulgaria's famous "Valley of Roses," which supplied 90 per cent. of the world's supply of attar, or oil of roses, is threatened with ruin. Over half the rose bushes in the valley, situated at the foot of the Balkans, comprising thousands of acres, have been seized with a disease resembling very much the phyloxera. Experts thus far have discovered neither the nature of the disease nor a remedy. The minister of agriculture has already proposed, in vain, several prizes for the invention of an effective remedy. Last year's crop of attar was only 3000 kilogrammes, and the great decrease is due chiefly to the mysterious disease, which attacks the roots of the rose bush.

CURRENT VERSE.

Here for a Time, a Breath of Time.

With the lone hills of sheep,
Stone-scarred and gray,
And the lone bleat;
With the brown old sleeping meres that meet
The storm's sweep,
The sun's sway
And the stars, and all the seasons, with unaltering face;
With the moor-mists swift
As they have swift
Down the slow dayfall since the ancient days;
With the sound of the last curlew drifting
As it hath drifted
To the new dawn beat
Of tired innumerable wings:
These pitilessly aloof
In their harsh loneliness,
These pitifully weak
Against the stress
Of the eternal rebuff,
Here, for a little span
On their illimitable bleak
Abideth the warm memory
O man.

Here, for a time, a breath of time, he brings
Faiths groping past the hills, and visionings;
Faiths and visionings great and sure
As the calm of the moor.
With feeble scratchings he made his mark
On the hill's steep;
For a day and a dark
They endure,
By a dark they outlast his laughter and tears,
His song.
The feeble scratchings he hath traced along
By the hill's feet
Fainter as they uplift to the farthest crest
And the cloud-veils,
Outliving by a dark
The faiths and the fears
Of his breast
And the visionings—
By these he maketh his mark.
With the lone hills of sheep
Overspreading his eyes, and on his ears
The lone bleat,
He sinketh in sleep.
Deep
As the deep of dales
Is his sleep;
More deep
Than the brown old sleep of meres that meet
The storm's sweep,
The sun's sway
And the stars, and all the seasons, with unaltering face.

He dreams: in his dream he passeth not away.
He endureth even as they
These most solitary things,
These pitilessly aloof
In their harsh loneliness,
These pitifully weak
Against the stress
Of the eternal rebuff—
The lone hills, stone-scarred and gray,
The storm's sweep,
The stars, and the sun's sway;
The moor-mists swift
As they have swift
Down the slow dayfall since the ancient days;
The sound of the last curlew drifting
As it hath drifted
To the new dawn beat of tired innumerable wings.

Flood-Tide.

From the heart of the mystic ocean
Comes the call of the Infinite,
As I stand on the shore and listen
In the summer dark, star-lit.
I stretch my arms to the billows
That break on the sandy beach,
And I guard in my soul the lesson
That only the sea can teach.
The message is not for the many
But only the strong, whose souls
Have passed through the world unshackled
And never lost sight of their foals;
Whose feet have never stumbled,
Whose heads have never been bowed,
Who, dauntless have steered their passage
Where the deepest furrows plowed.
The Infinite calls me ever
And I pray when my body has died,
I may wait for the new life somewhere
As a part of the great Flood-Tide.
—Virginia T. McCormick in "Star Dust and Gardens."

To Whom It May Concern.

Cape Cod Humorist Coming.

San Francisco is to have two evenings of fun with the American humorist, Joseph C. Lincoln, known as "The Cape Cod Chronicler." Lincoln is the author of "Cap'n Dri" and a score of other Cape Cod novels, "Cape Cod Ballads" and "Shavings," a play. He reads histories even better than he writes them.

He is scheduled to appear, under the direction of Paul Elder, in the Scottish Rite Auditorium, Tuesday and Thursday evenings, April 25th and 27th. He will also speak in the Paul Elder Gallery Wednesday afternoon, April 26th. The programme will be different on each occasion.

A Chinese baby in China receives its name under peculiar circumstances. If it is a boy its head is shaved at a feast to which friends and relatives are invited. Many bring presents. In some parts of the country the present takes the form of a silver plate with good wishes engraved upon it.

TRAINED NURSE, graduate of King's College Hospital, London, wishes a position to care for invalid, elderly person, children or in the capacity of companion on European trip. Speaks English, Italian and French. References. Address G. S., care of First National Bank, San Francisco.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

A man, in love with a dimple, often makes the mistake of marrying the whole girl.—London Opinion.

Little Girl (caught stealing jam)—Well, mummy, I'm very sorry; but these little lapses will occur.—Punch.

Judge—What made you pick this man's pocket? Prisoner—Judge, I never picked it. It just happened to be next.—Judge.

Teacher—What is a mummy? Junior—A mummy is—a mummy is—a mummy is a poppy's wife.—Youngstown Telegram.

First College Man—I want you to come to our dance tonight. Second Ditto—Thanks. Is it formal; or shall I wear my own clothes?—Life.

Irate Mother—I'll larn yer! Throw rice on the princess, would yer, when it was meant for yer farver's curry!—London Passing Show.

"Did your brother have any luck when he was hunting tigers in India, John?" "Yes, sir, great luck—he never met any."—Irish World.

Fisherman—Don't you want to buy some fine crabs, sir? Look—they're all alive. Summer Boarder—Yes, but are they fresh?—Paris Le Journal Amusant.

Registrar—Mr. Brown, you have overcut French. Why do you go to New York so often? Stude—Why—I—er—go to see my grandmother. Registrar—Do you mean the one I saw you with last Saturday? Wonderful how these old women get around nowadays!—Yale Record.

Guest—Do you make a reduction to people in the same line of business? Manager—Yes. Are you a restaurateur? Guest—No. I'm a thief by profession.—Paris La Baionnette.

"Fashions are hindrances to health." "I don't think so," rejoined Miss Cayenne. "Only robust people can wear silk stockings in winter and furs in summer."—Washington Star.

"Here's my bill," said the surgeon. "Wish you would pay down $100, and then $25 per week." "Sounds like buying an automobile," said the patient. "I am," said the surgeon.—Charleston News and Courier.

The Larger Boy—I want a tooth out, an' I don't want gas, 'cos I'm in a 'urry. The Dentist—That's a brave young man! Which tooth is it? The Larger Boy—Show 'im yer tooth, Albert.—London Passing Show.

"What's it the sign of when your girl refuses to kiss you?" asks a hurt contemporary. Well, it used to mean she had a split lip or had been eating onions, and we don't believe the feminine nature has changed any.—Buffalo Times.

The Waiter (who is on a week's notice)—Did you have tomato or pea soup, sir? The Customer—Heaven knows! It tasted more like soap. The Waiter—Ah, that would be tomato, sir. The pea soup tastes like paraffin.—Punch.

Judge Priest—Parson, that turkey you sold me yesterday wasn't a tame one as you claimed it to be, for I found shot in it. Parson Brown—Judge, dat was a tame turkey jest like I sed it was; dem shot was meant for me.—Judge.

Sandy—So ye didn't go away for the New Year, Mac? Mac—No, Sandy. The Macgregors wrote an' invited me to their place, an' I'd like to have gone, but they forgot tae enclosed a stamped envelope for reply.—London Passing Show.

It was during the impaneling of a jury; the following colloquy occurred: "You are a property-holder?" "Yes, your honor." "Married or single?" "I have been married for five years, your honor." "Have you formed or expressed any opinion?" "Not for five years, your honor."—Journal of the American Medical Association.

Sherlock and the faithful Watson were strolling down Piccadilly. "There's a woman in very short skirts just behind us, my dear doctor," murmured the great detective. "Marvelous!" enthused Watson, after he had corroborated the statement by a glance behind. "How in the world did you ever know without turning your head?" "Purely elementary, dear old fellow. I merely observed the faces of the people who are walking toward us."—American Legion Weekly.

Who remembers the name of Aaron Manby? It is just one hundred years ago since the first iron steamboat left the dockyards of Tipton, in England, and, after being tested on the Thames, was employed in a direct service between London and Paris. In 1822 a return was made to the House of Commons showing the time consumed by steamers as compared with sailing vessels on some thirty coasting routes; the average speed given for steamers in the best of these was from eight to nine knots, while the average time taken varied from one-half to one-sixth (or even less) of the time taken by sailing vessels. After the first sea voyage the Aaron Manby was employed solely on the Seine, where it navigated as late as 1846.

New York's Good Taste.

George Wybo, the well-known French architect, on returning from America has published in l'Intransigeant his impressions of architecture in this country.

"An examination of the thirty or forty-story-high office buildings raised within recent years," he says, "buildings of an impeccable though rapid execution, well proportioned, with harmonious lines, with sober decorations, made of splendid and well-worked materials, causes us to modify a too generally accepted opinion, and to recognize a new art, in the true sense of the word, an art calculated to make us receive strong impressions, such as we receive from the power and grandeur of our cathedrals and other monuments of the past.

"In lower Broadway and near the City Hall," he says, speaking of New York, "rising to a height of over 200 metres, are the most formidable business temples, such as the Woolworth, Equitable, Adams, Cunard, Bankers' Trust and Liberty Tower buildings. These, different among themselves, but each in its own genre, by their construction, their form, their lines of architecture and their disposition are indisputably masterpieces.

"The public institutions, such as the new Municipal Building, the Hudson River docks, the Custom House, the new Public Library, Pennsylvania Station, the Grand Central Terminal and the hotels Commodore, Biltmore, Vanderbilt, Belmont and Pennsylvania, are also, not only by their aspect, their beautiful proportions, and their execution, but also by their arrangement, their utility, and their perfect order, beautiful monuments which do honor to the city possessing them and to the architects who built them.

"The new churches, the most remarkable of which is that of St. Thomas; the beautiful dwelling houses, the clubs, the banks, the stores of luxury on Fifth Avenue, displaying the choicest materials, marble, precious woods and stones and the finest chiseled bronze, are worthy of the elegant customers who visit them; for one must recognize the delicate taste shown by New York women, both in their toilet and their homes."

Upon this the editor of l'Intransigeant remarks that the good taste of Americans can not cause surprise, because they appreciate the masterpieces of French art.

Candid Hostess (on seeing her nephew's fiancée for the first time)—I never should have known you from your photograph. Reggie told me you were so pretty. Reggie's Fiancée—No, I'm not pretty, so I have to try to be nice, and it's such a bore. Have you ever tried?—Pearson's Weekly.

Eleven per cent. of the foreign-born white population in the United States, ten years of age or older, according to the 1920 census, was unable to speak English.

PORTOLA WOODS

A Spring Valley Subdivision

In the desirable Woodside district of San Mateo County is the country-home acreage known as Portola Woods. It adjoins the Family Farm and the properties of Stanford University, being situated less than five miles from the University buildings.

Here are thickets and open spaces, hills and hollows, with a wealth of oaks, redwoods and other trees, the whole so subdivided as to give each parcel the charm of scenic variety.

Bear Gulch Creek flows through the property to join San Francisco Creek.

Water is piped to every lot, the roads are good, there are here combined the advantages of rustic seclusion and accessibility.

Home-sites vary in size from 8 to 39 acres. For the parcels that remain unsold prices per acre range from $450 to $650—lower than prevailing prices for similar property in that region. These prices are particularly attractive compared with prices of city lots.

The high-class improvements on the parcels already sold stamp the countryside so unmistakably that this subdivision can not fail to appeal to the most discriminating seeker after the ideal country-home site.

A Possible Bridge.

The prospects for improved transportation in and out of San Francisco have been greatly bettered by recent developments, and the handicaps of the city's peninsular location, if it imposes any handicaps, should shortly be reduced to the minimum. The Hyde Street-Marin County ferry plans are going along well. It seems reasonable to expect that Yerba Buena Island will be turned into something useful as a union railway terminal and the ferry haul thus cut in two; and that the bridge will be built across the bay—at Dumbarton Point. There are those who believe that if Yerba Buena Island could have been made a railway terminal fifty years ago the work done at Port Costa would have been much more quickly and economically performed near San Francisco. Anti-corporation hatreds prevented it then, and it is a sign of growing reason and understanding that this shadow does not appear to darken the present prospects. Building a bridge at Dumbarton Point is something that can be done, and it will be done the sooner if there can be diverted to it the energy of eloquence certain persons have heretofore devoted to bridging the bay in the line of Yerba Buena Island. That bridge was built of unalloyed optimism. Optimism is a fine, stimulating thing, often born of youth and inexperience, sometimes valuable as a tonic to the human system and the social order, but often strangely misleading as to conclusions. The island bridge project had behind it the automobile interests. The automobile business is a young business, and the salesmen in it are, as a rule, young men, gifted beyond all reasonable requirements with that emotive mental stimulus known as enthusiasm. Bridges are not built by enthusiasm, but by hard-headed, cost-counting, and distance-figuring engineers; better qualified, perhaps, if they have a dash of cold Scotch blood. Bridging the bay between city and island hardly belongs in the realm of prophecy—it is more a matter of poetry. But when we get down to Dumbarton we are on a basis at least of the possible. The basin south of that line is not important, and some day, to indulge in a little prophecy, it may be filled in and used to support the skyscrapers of a really greater San Francisco. In the meantime, the best accommodation for automobiles crossing the bay will continue to be the mobile ferryboat with its flexible schedule, alterable to fit changing "load" conditions. We should have more of them, and then our transportation troubles would be greatly diminished. Of course, one of the worst aspects of the business is the peak load of Sundays, with comparatively idle plant the balance of the week. But that applies to bridges as well as ferryboats. And while a ferryboat that was superfluous six days of the week might be taken somewhere else for that period and put into other service, the bridge must stay where it is. There is hardly any way to reduce that peak except to introduce five or six new religions with distributed days for observance, by automobile. We do not expect that. Yet the engineers say they can do anything if they can get the money.

The Faith of France.

When Premier Poincaré, from Bar-le-Duc, declares that France will if necessary see to it alone that the treaty of Versailles is executed in case Germany attempts to evade the reparations payment, he undoubtedly voices the determination of the French people, who have been over-patient with an exasperating situation and have reason to feel they have failed to receive just recognition of their forbearance from any quarter. In the interests of harmony, France has accepted reductions of her dues from the Germans, only to be misunderstood and misrepresented even in this country, by persons who should have had more respect for her heroism and her sacrifices. There will probably be no further wavering. There is nothing vacillating about French sentiment where a bill is concerned; and those that have been expecting submissive amiability until the reparations payments, through successive adjustments, should have diminished to the vanishing point will probably find that, like Cousin Egbert, France can be pushed just so far.

The war cost her $56,130,000,000 and the ruin of seven of her richest departments. She did not provoke it; on the contrary she did what she could to placate her implacable enemy by withdrawing her armies ten miles behind the frontier within forty-eight hours of the actual outbreak of hostilities. That may have been a "gesture," but it was a noble one, a significant one, and one that really involved the gravest dangers. She lost 1,400,000 men and incalculable wealth in the disorganization of her trade and industry. Yet at the London conference of May, 1921, in order to help the restoration of Europe, she voluntarily consented to a reduction of her just claim on Germany, as fixed by the Reparations Commission, from 218,000,000,000 francs to about 180,000,000,000 francs, or approximately 20 per cent. Claims of America and England for feeding the Germans after the armistice, and for keeping troops on the Rhine, were given priority over those of France, so that she has not yet received a cent from Germany, and her government has had to advance for German account some 80,000,000,000 francs for restoration of the area the Germans devastated, for pensions to those they widowed, orphaned, wounded and disabled, and for interest on the sums her government had to borrow for these purposes.

Germany was not devastated. She had no ruined mines and factory districts. In 1921 she spent more than 250,000,000,000 marks; raising railroad wages, building workmen's cottages, and, what is more significant of inclination, collecting as little as possible in the way of railroad fares and taxes while permitting her people to export their stocks, bonds, and money to Switzerland. She is today launching a new merchant marine, and three of her largest ships bear the names of Tirpitz, Ludendorff, and Buelow—an insult to the nations she wronged. The French people are paying taxes at the rate of $45.62 a head annually—the German at the rate of $13.88.

To a casual observer from another planet it might appear that Germany had performed an act of merit for which she was now enjoying a well-earned reward. She is, in fact, likely to reimburse herself rapidly out of her new Russian business for every pfennig she spent trying to conquer western Europe.

In spite of this inequitable and iniquitous state of affairs, propaganda is incessant, and even appears on the floor of Congress at times, to discredit France and promote distrust of her on the part of her recent allies. She is accused of maintaining a large standing army. She has fewer men and officers under arms by 166,000 than she had in July, 1914. She is accused of wasting her resources on armaments. She spends far less today on her army than the United States, and less than half what is spent by Great Britain, in spite of the fact that German disarmament is largely sham and Germany is maintaining a pretty skeleton of a military system which can be expanded and mobilized on the shortest notice. She is accused of extravagance in a world that is starving. Yet she has reduced her budget and her paper money and seems to be applying to all her problems that care and thrift which are among her great national virtues.

These things should be understood. Some of them are well known, but are in danger of being forgotten unless there is reassertion of them in the midst of the continuous misrepresentation by the friends of the recent common enemy. The statistical basis of most of these statements appears in the course of an article by Stephane Lauzanne, a reputable French publicist, printed in the current North American Review. The article is entitled "France in the Dock," and that title should bring a sense of shame to those that have sought unjustly to put her there. She has bled for civilization, she has been the sacrifice of nations. If she wearies now of misrepresentation and injustice, and declares she will stand no more of it in the injurious form of further reduction of German reparations, Americans should be the last people on earth to blame her—we were last into the war. "Let us have peace"—and let us be just.

The Return of Dolliverism.

If you have committed any new tariff schedules to memory from the bill recently reported out by the Senate Finance Committee, you will have time to unlearn them before the bill passes, for it is not going to pass very soon, and when it does it will not greatly resemble its present self, either in detail or in general purpose. The fluid condition of world affairs is having some strange effects, and the longer the passage of the bill is delayed the more radical the changes in it are likely to be. We shall probably have to bring up a changeling.

Observers at Washington remark that the tariff bill is now haunted by the ghost of Senator Dolliver of Iowa. Dolliver is dead, but his footfalls still reverberate through the corridors of the Capitol with echoes that are hollow and ominous. It was Dolliver who, in 1909, introduced the Iowa idea in the form of insurgency against the Payne-Aldrich bill; that idea being that the farmer was more interested in low tariffs on what he had to buy than on high protection on what he had to sell, because his surplus is exported and hence the prices he receives are made abroad in competition with foreigners, while the prices he pays are made under domestic conditions, in which a high tariff prevents foreign competition from operating in his favor.

That seemed a good platform on which to stand for a moderate tariff. But the farmers have not of late consistently stood upon it. Last year they became alarmed over the dumping of a five-year accumulation of Australian wool and large quantities of Canadian wheat; and the farm bloc, organized, led, and told just where it might get off by the American Farm Bureau Federation, began demanding extraordinary protection on farm products. The farm bloc became extremely influential among a lot of congressmen that dread trouble, and the result was the agricultural emergency tariff.

Now comes the comic opera twist. The farmers' chorus is on the stage, with rakes, funny hats, big boots and all, prepared for a real agricultural hoe-down, the orchestra is tuned for "Turkey in the Straw," the fun is about to begin, when a messenger arrives announcing that the Australian wool is all used up and the Canadian wheat is as high as the American; and so no high tariff on such commodities can do the farmers any real good, whereas the wicked manufacturers who inhabit the big cities and have dark dealings with capitalists and bankers are about to receive a degree of protection heretofore unknown, under which they can charge what they like on whatever the farmer has to buy. Consternation. Dark stage. And when the lights go up again the farmers are figuring instead of singing and dancing.

The figuring appears to have led them back to, or at least toward, the Iowa idea and the Dolliver policy. The Argonaut is informed that the Farm Bureau Federation has denounced the American valuation plan as an instrument for raising a tariff barrier against imports. The farmers are beginning to understand that trade can not flow one way all the time, any more than water in a tub. Senator Gooding, an Idaho sheep-grower, had been made the head of a strictly Republican tariff bloc, and he was strong for the American valuation scheme, but he suddenly found that the scow had sunk under him. When the vote on the valuation clause was taken in the Finance Committee there were only three members who would stand for the new system. But the tariff bloc, on the theory that the farmer still wanted what he once had wanted, could not understand, and went ahead elevating farm schedules. And twenty-four hours after the bill was made public President J. R. Howard of the Farm Bureau Federation made a violent attack on it as containing indefensibly high rates on manufactured products. He went right back to the shocking Iowa notion of thirteen years ago: that the farmers are more interested in low rates on what they buy than on high rates on what they sell. And he said: "What the Senate needs is another Dolliver."

So the Iowa notion has come back, and Dolliverism stalks again through the marble halls of the Capitol. When Dolliver lived thatism was strong, and it seems likely to be so again. The farm bloc and the tariff bloc are very ill. It is said that their morale has been destroyed and their solidarity has departed. The agenda has been kicked into the Potomac, the league is busted. The situation invites parliamentary anarchy. And in the House, Fordney is fuming about the loss of the American valuation plan, and does not seem at all placated by the mechanism the present bill provides, through which the President has power within a 50 per cent. limit to raise and lower duties and fix their rates on the American wholesale price in order to prevent dumping.

In the meantime, persons who suppose the President has taken full charge of the situation are a little in error. He may be able to dominate Congress when he wishes to, but he sees no necessity for dominating it just now. In fact, it is better not. Making tariffs is the particular job of Congress, and to Congress belongs the responsibility, the glory, and the grief. President Harding is wise enough to understand that. He has just achieved one victory, in respect to the navy personnel, and judicious moderation is the keynote of his character. He will probably have something to say about the wisdom and the moral necessity of redeeming party pledges by the early enactment of a permanent tariff law, but it is also likely that he will not go very far beyond that. We may not see any tariff legislation at all at this session of Congress, and by the time the matter is taken up again it may have become evident that what we need is a tariff that will enable Europe to trade a little more freely with us instead of less so, in order to stabilize the exchange situation and enable her to pay her debts. There would still be room for the principle of protection to operate, in cases where it was needed and found expedient.

The Barbers of Oroville.

In Sacramento the Days of '49 Committee has "launched" a beard-growing contest among some aspirants for easy athletic honors who started from scratch with clean shaves and will finish at the coming celebration with enough hair for a mattress. It is a silly business, but this is a silly world, and so the capillary conflict has produced considerable publicity (which may or may not be valuable) for the capital of California. It will probably cause many more persons to hear of Sacramento than would ever have heard of it otherwise, but hardly to flock there and invest in real estate or put up office buildings in the hope of having them tenanted by other immigrants attracted to permanent settlement, investment, and development by the whisker sweepstakes. And the race itself seems lacking in power to thrill, the contestants being more suggestive of Rip Van Winkle than of good, going business. Watching other people's whiskers grow is a milder game than dry golf, and probably not much more exciting than Mark Twain's celebrated ride on a glacier. For that reason we should have expected the conflict to rage in silence, attracting rather pity than hostility and opposition.

But in such a distracted world you never can tell; and it appears that the hate habit has become so ingrained in us during recent years that, combined with the general disposition to reach for any selfish advantage, certain barbers of Oroville have started a drive against Sacramento's latest form of dissipation. They put their obstructionism on high moral grounds. They do not purpose forcibly to tie down and shave the chin athletes of their sister city and then collect for it, including tips, but in accordance with the prevalent practice of crying for help to some government commission every time anything is either desired or disliked, they appeal to have the cruel spectacle suppressed by the state board of health on the theory that it is insanitary. Thus they make themselves our protectors, and the state board of health their protectors, and acquire much merit for serving themselves; and incidentally, if they win, it is going to look very bad for our old Poughkeepsie friends the Smith Brothers, Trade and Mark.

Of course, what the barbers of Oroville really mean is that if the Sacramento example should result in bringing beards back into fashion it would be insanitary for the financial system of their ancient craft. It is neither a fresh nor a refreshing principle of political activity. It would be, on the contrary, both fresh and refreshing a sort of living Bughouse Fable, if the barbers would declare that in the interest of economy men should either wear beards and long hair as of yore, or shave themselves and have their wives apply the clippers to their heads; if salesmen in stores would persuade extravagant customers that they do not need to clutter up their homes, garrets, and back yards with so many useless things; if manufacturers would send lobbies to Washington to persuade Congress that they do not need quite so high a tariff; if the American Legion would say: "We think general business ought to be permitted to get on its feet so that the unemployed may find work before anything is done about a bonus, and then when almost everybody is earning money we probably shall not need any further help, except in cases of disablement"; if the automobile salesman would say: "It is not good business for you to buy a car until you have paid off the mortgage now on your home"; if a tailor would tell a customer: "I made that last suit so well that you do not need another just yet, and I refuse to make one for you. Take your money home to your wife and children, or put it in the bank and let the banker circulate it in the form of a loan to some needed and financially reproductive enterprise"; or if the milliner would say: "Madame, I think the cheaper hat is more becoming."

But nothing of the sort happens. Sometimes it looks as though it never would. Our guess is that it never will, at least in our time. We all seem to be made from the same earthy substance as the barbers of Oroville. Several centuries ago the silversmiths of Ephesus raised the cry, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," because they did a good business in images among her devotees, and Christianity seemed to threaten it. That principle is always at work in the world. Its recurrent assertion in new forms is part of the price of liberty. At worst, the barbers are no worse than the silversmiths.

Probably the greatest chapter, or lodge, of the Ancient Order of the Barbers of Oroville is now in session at Genoa.

Too Many Laws.

This week's revelations in police corruption of the bootleg brand, or as the headline writers call it, "rum graft," among certain members of the San Francisco force will shock and humiliate those citizens who have believed their police were 100 per cent. pure and sacrosanct, if such persons there be; but the others will not be greatly surprised. Corruption is the natural result of laws that attempt to regulate the intimate habits and suppress the propensities of the people, and if there were before Volstead any police departments in the United States that were innocent and pure they probably are so no longer. Rum running has been made so lucrative and the illicit privilege so valuable that impetuous men can hardly be expected not to make merchandise of their power to interfere with it. Many of the New York police have made a very good thing of their positions, and not so long ago the chief of police of Chicago was quoted to the effect that probably half his force was engaged in bootlegging of some sort. Not even the Federal force is clean of such suspicions. Mr. Brolaski's term has just begun.

Chief O'Brien stoutly declares that he will make a clean sweep of any policemen found to be crooked. That is good talk for a person in his position. He could hardly say anything and say less. And he will have the sympathy of the judicious, and the moral support of every "dry" in the city and even some of the "wets." There will be shake-ups, and perhaps prosecutions, and afterwards the running and the moonshining will proceed as before—in fact, we doubt if the utmost virtuous activity will greatly interfere with its course, even while that activity is at its height. The condition invites corruption, and corruption there is going to be. That is the worst of it.

The matter goes much farther into the system of our politics and the evolution of our national life than the Volstead Act or the question of the sinfulness of liquor. The lesson of human experience is that corruption keeps pace with the multiplication of laws. It is a commonplace that the downfall of Rome was caused by the corruption of her ancient public virtues. But the deduction of some very astute modern historians is that the corruption was produced by excessive law-making. We have had an epidemic of it in this country for the past century, with the infection growing more virulent every year, the disease spreading in wider and wider circles. No lawyer any longer attempts to keep track of what legislatures are doing, or under what new statutes his clients are supposed to live and carry on their business. Attorneys rely on their ability to find out those things when they need to, but that is no longer easy, as it ought to be. And it has become equally difficult, in fact impossible, for any human brain to keep abreast of the judicial decisions that have to be multiplied over and over in the effort to do justice and prevent oppression in the wilderness of statutes where business finds itself wandering today.

Under such a condition it is too much even for innocence to expect venal men in office not to take advantage of their positions and extort money or favor or promote the interests of friends by means of privilege and discrimination. And venal men there will be in office, because there are so many men in office—more and more of them, to enforce all the new laws—commissions and bureaus, with their hosts of clerks and deputies and office help of various sorts until it has been calculated that on the average every fifty-two American taxpayers now carry forty-eight city, county, state and Federal job-holders on their backs; almost one per taxpayer.

The worst aspect of the business is not its money cost, but the tendency to set up government commissions and inspecting agencies to attend to all the affairs of life, until the sphere of activity of the individual is contracted to his mere physical functions and no room is left either for a self-controlled private life or for the operation of individual initiative in enterprise and business. We can see this tendency illustrated in the present case. Police Captain Goff is, as far as we are informed, a good and zealous public servant, but he appears tempted by the importance and difficulty of his service to believe that that service should be facilitated by at least one method foreign to the spirit of American institutions: the European system of domiciliary visitation and search. He is quoted to the effect that it would be far more satisfactory from the police standpoint if there were a local ordinance allowing police officers the right of search under the "dry" law. Undoubtedly it would, but there is more in life than assisting the police in the enforcement of regulations against artificial sin. Continental Europeans may tolerate such official supervision and domestic invasion as would occur under such a system, but Americans should not, even if somebody gets an illicit drink of whisky occasionally. Unless the extension of paternalism in government is stopped, however, Americans will be forced into acquiescence with the minutest supervision of their private lives, for there will soon be no field left uninvaded by legislation and unregulated by some government commission with its flock of inspectors and deputies knocking at the door, prying into our affairs, demanding to know how many children we propose to have and when, and why our wives don't stay home and attend to their maternal duties on some plan laid down by government sociological experts. It has been estimated that city, state, and Federal law-making bodies in this country grind out about 100 laws daily. Most of these are meddlesome, mischievous, evil in their effect of reducing respect for law as an institution. Probably we are all law-breakers except those of us who are very ill; and it is doubtful if an invalid could go far in a wheelchair without transgressing some traffic regulation, passed for a temporary expediency which common-law decisions could have handled just as well.

Excessive law-making follows perverted political thinking; for underlying all this multiplicity of laws is the fundamental fallacy of paternalism—the idea that whatever is wrong ought to be righted and can be righted by passing a law about it, and that the government should be the good father of the people. That is a typically German error, and it led Germany into the bog. The main use of government, in this country at least, is to secure liberty and protect property. Equality it can not give. Nor can it ever take the place in industry of the free effort of the individual.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

From a Discerning Reader.

OAKLAND, April 21, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Enclosed please find my subscription to your valued paper for one year. In my reading there is no weekly that gives me more helpful suggestions and no periodical that does more to stimulate my thinking. Not that I see things eye to eye with your editorial policy, for I do not, almost as often as I do. But your steadfastness of purpose and placing of high principle above policy and temporary clamor command my respect. One needs to have a weekly message, written with discrimination, when other sheets have reported the death of Lenin one hundred times in the past few years, and when politicians, being leaderless, are almost daily reporting another bonus bill for passage in Congress. Yours truly, (RABBI) RUDOLPH I. COFFEE.

The Arbuckle Testimony.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 22, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In your editorial of April 22d on the Arbuckle case you refer to my charges that, in the effort to convict Arbuckle, the testimony was fabricated and processed. You then say: "Since we can not believe that an attorney of Mr. McNab's character and standing at the bar would descend to misrepresentation or even to improper loose talk in order to save a guilty client, we must suppose that he had reason to believe what he said when he said it."

My charges rested on the record of the case—the undisputed testimony. From many circumstances appearing in the record I cite the following:

On the day of the unhappy event in the hotel rooms there were four women present—one, the deceased; another, Maud Bambina Delmont, who became the complaining witness for the district attorney in swearing to the complaint against Arbuckle; the others, Miss Alice Blake and Miss Zey Prevost.

Mrs. Delmont, although in the beginning uniting with the district attorney in melodramatic, shocking and hysterical fulminations in the press, was allowed by the prosecution to leave the state and was never produced as a witness.

Miss Blake and Miss Prevost, without having committed, or being charged with, any offense, or being served with any process whatever, were seized by the district attorney and imprisoned for months in the home of one of his deputies and excluded from interview or examination by the defense.

Before the trial, the written statements of these young women were taken by the authorities.

As complete proof of my charges of fabricated testimony, I refer any person interested to the official transcript of the evidence, containing cross-examination of these, the principal witnesses for the state, in the three trials, and to their written statements. Yours very truly, GAVIN McNAB.

GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS.

North Dakota Improvers See in the Water and Power Act an Extension of Their Blessings to California.

If a man had thirteen million dollars and thirteen children, and he gave the children everything they asked for, he would soon be reduced to thirteen cents, and the children would not have anything either. The hypothesis is fanciful, of course, and involves the assumption that the man inherited the money, for no one that had the sagacity to accumulate thirteen million dollars would behave that way. But a government which has assumed the paternal relation to the people would have a strong tendency in that direction.

Government does not have to make its money; it takes it from the taxpayers. Government can not make goods out of thin air at no expense. Yet the faith is cherished by an appallingly large number of persons that government can go into business and supply the people with goods or services for nothing. To persons not well acquainted with it, and unaccustomed to clear thinking, it seems like some great, benign power, gifted with infinite wisdom, that can take the place of the Deity on earth and make us all happy. But government is nothing but a lot of politicians, and most of them are inclined to indulge the demands of everybody; first, to get votes, by which they live, move, and have their being; and second, because, crooked or honest, they are as a class amiable and sympathetic persons who would really like to relieve all the distress there is and give everybody just what he asks for. The state treasury looks bottomless, the taxing power seems an endless resource. So there is temptation on both sides for government and people to assume the paternal and filial relation.

It won't work. A socialist observer has made that surprising discovery about Bolshevism: "the trouble with it is that it doesn't work." We do not, however, have to go so far afield and among conditions so foreign to see government trying to do business and miserably falling down on the job. The Federal government made a hash of operating the railroads and ships, and North Dakota tells even more luminously the story of paternalism, or state socialism, among American people of the best Scandinavian stock, operating from a heritage of American institutions and tradition. The state will recover in some shape, but many individuals are ruined for life, and will not recover any more than some of the old San Francisco families ruined by the earthquake and fire have recovered. They are human sacrifices on the altars erected by the dervishes of "government in business."

It is strange that so little news of the Non-Partisan League's activities has appeared in the daily press outside of North Dakota. It is the most interesting and instructive experiment that has taken place in this country since the civil war. We in California do not have to pay anything for it, unless we wish to repeat it, in which case the way is prepared. Even the price is set: $500,000,000; although it can increase. We can multiply our state debt by five or six under the proposed Water and Power Amendment to the Constitution, in order to have politicians instead of business men develop water and electric energy, just as in North Dakota the people turned their treasury over to the politicians so that they might build grain elevators and flour mills, and homes that the people should have built for themselves, and conduct banks and insurance companies. Through the dust of the ensuing wreckage we can see some forty or fifty broken banks and the depositors whistling for their money, insurance a year or so behind in paying losses, loans called and mortgages foreclosed, and pathetic efforts making among the bewildered people to repair the ruin by means of co-operative grain pools, joint sales agencies, and other vagaries of Utopian collectivism—anything rather than admit they were wrong and return to American individualism and sound business principles. Says a Fargo business man in a letter to the Coast Banker:

No man living can portray the fearfulness of the situation engendered by them, and my sympathy goes out to you good people of California if you are in for a dose of Non-Partisan Leagueism. . . . At the time the Non-Partisan League took us over, about six years ago, this county owed only a little over $300,000, and this included bonded as well as a small floating debt. As near as we can ascertain now, we owe in the neighborhood of from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000, and there is nothing to show for it except the aftermath of a financial debacle. Every known industry, such as state-owned homes, a state-owned mill and elevator, and a state bank, which all proved losing propositions, was tried, and was the means of plunging the state hopelessly into debt. It was the worst dream ever heard of and wound up just as any socialist proposition will. They had a free hand here and went the limit, and the results speak for themselves.

The Courier-News of Fargo, organ of the league, said in a recent issue: "Never in the history of our state has distress prevailed among the farmers as it does today. Never has want in all its naked ugliness shown itself as it is seen today in many parts of our state."

Of course, the league's organ does not blame the league. But such a condition as it depicts does not come on a great industrial class in an hour. "Yesterday this day's madness did prepare." It takes a long season of folly to prepare for such a devolution, and then it makes headway slowly against stubborn resistance. In North Dakota the thing began with the election of a Non-Partisan League governor in 1916 and a legislature in 1918. Great enthusiasm was generated, as there always is about paternalistic projects that are going to save the people from the grasping and grabbing monopolists; and many of the small country newspapers espoused the beautiful new cause. Now, says the Hannaford (North Dakota) Enterprise, "nearly all the league newspapers are on the rocks, and farmer stockholders are holding the bag. Hell's to pay all around. One thing is demonstrated to the satisfaction of all fair-minded men, and that is that as soon as business is taken into politics efficiency and economy are lost and graft and favoritism take their places."

Lynn Frazier, the league's candidate for the United States Senate against Senator Porter J. McCumber, has the bright distinction of being the first governor of an American state to be recalled from office. That happened last October, under a law the league had fortunately passed. With him were recalled William Lemke, the attorney-general and real leader of the league, and the secretary of agriculture, whose name we forget, but it doesn't matter. Frazier, Lemke, and the secretary of agriculture were the industrial commission, charged with building elevators and mills, loaning state money on farms and for home-building, and operating a state bank. This political administration of industry was a chicken just out of the egg compared with the powers the California Water and Power Act would confer upon the board it seeks to create, but the people found they could not stand it. About a million was loaned on homes, and a million and a half on farms, and another million and a half was devoted to the construction of a mill and an elevator which were never completed. The whole population of the state is but 650,000. Before the days of the league the banks of North Dakota were accustomed to paying 2 per cent. on checking accounts and 4 on time deposits. That seemed stingy and avaricious on the part of the money devils, so the state-operated league bank began to pay 3 per cent. on checking accounts and 5½ on time deposits. To the general astonishment, something was wrong, and there were persons so evil-minded and inclined to compromise with iniquity that they expressed the suspicion that the money devils may have been right about those interest rates.

The industrial commission forced into the Bank of North Dakota as deposits all the funds of political subdivisions, but it was slow paying back. A hard-headed Jersey man that looked into the bank's affairs just before the recall found an account of "registered checks" amounting to $260,000. It seemed new in bank accountancy, so he inquired about it and was told it meant the checks were "registered for payment" some day, when the bank could pay them. School districts also found that when they wanted to draw their deposits it had become quite inconvenient. That gave the farmers in those districts a picture of political banking. It was fine for the league-controlled school system to teach the children nothing but good league principles, but where was the principal the school districts had entrusted to the league bank? The absent money was eloquent. Critics of the league said the deposits had been loaned to politicians to gamble with. We do not know, but it is not unlikely. Townley got a nice loan for his sisal plantation in Florida. Aside from that there have been bitter complaints of discrimination in loans. The league bank didn't seem to treat borrowers any better than a regular old money-devil bank, and it treated depositors much worse. As for efficiency, it was found by the state auditor that it had cost about $92,000 to lend $2,000,000; quite an "overhead."

And it had not done especially well by the farmers, for whose salvation it had been established. In fact the money devils seemed to do better, for in seven months of 1920, while the Bank of North Dakota had been able or willing to loan but about $3,000,000 for agricultural purposes, the Federal Reserve Bank at Minneapolis advanced to the North Dakota private banks to enable them to carry their farm customers $7,646,165, and the state and national banks of St. Paul and Minneapolis, where the most diabolical middlemen lived, advanced some $23,800,000. But perhaps that was just bait to get the farmers more securely into their power.

A typical league enterprise was the so-called Equity Packing Plant at Fargo. There is little animal husbandry in North Dakota, which is a wheat-growing state on a single-crop basis, and subject to all the vicissitudes of that limited and risky form of agriculture. One of the farmers' grievances was the price that had to be paid the Chicago packers for dressed meat. The cure was simple: just build a packing plant of their own. A representative of Armour & Co. was asked if a packing plant would pay in North Dakota, and he said that if it would Armour & Co. would have built one there long before. The collectivist packing-house was built. It was capitalized at $3,000,000 and lost $700,000 the first year. The Consumers' United Stores Company, another great league enterprise to rescue the farmers from the villainy of the middlemen, cost them a round million and then went into the hands of a receiver. So it was found, altogether, that the collective enterprises were pretty lame, and that the government in business had resulted in trebling the taxes, had made marketing conditions worse instead of better, had fallen down at state home building, and in the prompt payment of hail and other forms of state-managed insurance, that the operation of the state flour mill for a year had lost more than the mill had cost, and that it was time for a new arrangement. The "enemies of the people" succeeded in recalling the governor and the other members of the industrial commission. But not, be it observed, before the damage had been done. Neither in North Dakota nor in the California Water and Power Act does the recall of the politicians recall the money the politicians have wasted. Nor does it restore the conditions of hope and confidence under which alone private enterprise will consent to operate.

There are two great differences, among many others, between government in business, and business men in business. One is that business men do not go into new enterprises on a grievance basis, nor until they have satisfied themselves from laborious study that the new investment is going to be profitable; in other words, that it is needed. Ever see a man sitting on a municipal trash can with a checker in his hand counting the people who pass? That is "business," finding out whether that location will justify improvement. If the little ticker doesn't show a large enough number to fit all the other favorable elements of the horoscope the improvement will have to wait until it does. The other difference is that if the business man makes a mistake, it is his child and he pays for it, but if the government makes it, the interest on the loss goes into the tax rate and the taxpayers pay it annually until they die. They pay it long after the cause is forgotten and fresh troubles have added other percentages to the rate.

To belabor the subject further in this field would be to paint the lily, or perfume the rose. The people of North Dakota made themselves worse off than they were before, but it must be conceded that they had some provocation, in addition to the troubles natural to their single-barreled agriculture, which was probably the underlying cause of their original distresses. California, where private enterprise has led the world in the development of hydro-electric energy, has had no such grievance. Rates are not high, and they are under the control of the railway commission anyhow. The people are being well served, and their industries are flourishing on the energy supplied by the established companies. They lost nothing when the power sites were "grabbed"; rather they gained an invaluable service on which much of the state's present remarkable prosperity is based, and which they never would have had otherwise. The Water and Power Act is the product of political busybodies.

The Non-Partisan League, whether its followers know it or not, is socialistic in object and character. The marks on it and men in it make that unmistakable. Judge Bruce, professor of law in the University of Minnesota and formerly Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Dakota, has said on this subject:

There is nothing more illogical and absurd than the union in the Northwest of the socialist and farmer forces. It is the union of the lion and the lamb. It means the absolute assimilation of the latter if only the union continues. What is socialism, as defined by Karl Marx, by the Bolsheviks, by Wells, by all the socialistic leaders, and by all the writers on political economy? It is simply the government ownership and control of all the agencies of production. . . . If the so-called socialist orators told their audiences the real truth and defined socialism as it really should be defined, they would be accorded but a scant hearing and their followers would be few. Who of the farmers of the Northwest would be willing to throw their free homesteads, on which they have labored and which they now own, into the universal jackpot which socialism demands?

Efforts were made by the Non-Partisan Leaguers, as by the Bolsheviks, to extend the blessings of their system to other states, among them California. One of their "lecturers" is the socialist agitator Walter Thomas Mills, well known here. Mr. Mills is now organizing the Non-Partisan League in California, and so exactly in line with its socialistic nature and policy has the league found the proposed Water and Power Amendment to be that its official bulletin, the Hundred Thousand, published at Berkeley, says in its second number:

When the Modesto conference which created the preliminary organization of the Non-Partisan League of California adopted its declaration on behalf of the state development of natural resources, it had definitely in mind, among other matters, the referendum now pending on the Water and Power Act.

Note the "among other matters." The Water and Power Act is regarded by socialists as a good beginning in revolution. That is the sort of act it is, and that is the sort of support it has. MORTON TODD.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 26, 1922.

A strange phenomenon, due, according to scientific authorities, to still unexplained magnetic influences, has for a whole month been observed daily in London. Watches and chronometers have been stopping suddenly. It has been useless to take them to the watchmaker, who could not detect the trouble, nor remedy it. After the lapse of an hour or two, however, the watches begin going again, and all that is needed is to set them at the right hour.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Two Portuguese aviators, Captains Sacadura and Coutinho, who successfully flew from Lisbon to Rio de Janeiro, have been decorated by their government for their transoceanic feat.

José Gomez, a Mexican laborer of La Habra, California, is an amateur sculptor whose work done in spare hours as recreation has been accepted by cathedrals in many parts of the country.

Miss Katharine Barry, the Irish "Joan of Arc," and sister of Kevin Barry, the last man to be hanged as a rebel by the British forces in Ireland, has arrived in this country, accompanied by Countess Markievicz, in the interests of the Irish Republic.

Rossana Zezos, Italian poetess and feminist leader, was recently imprisoned in Milan for wearing masculine attire. The intrepid Italian suffragist prefers jail in her chosen costume to liberty in the dress prescribed by the Italian government for women.

Two prominent radio fans are Secretary of State Hughes, who has long been a devotee, and General Pershing, who is rapidly becoming expert. Mr. Hughes has a receiving set in his home and has just had another installed in the State Department offices.

Major Charles M. Stedman of North Carolina and Henry Z. Osborne of California are the only "Blue and Gray" survivors in the National House of Representatives. Major Stedman fought four years under General Lee and Mr. Osborne enlisted at sixteen to serve under Grant.

Two Englishwomen to attain unusual positions recently for members of their sex are Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, daughter of Charles Bradlaugh, M. P., who has been appointed a justice of the peace for the County of London, and Miss Adler, who was recently elected deputy chairman of the London County Council—the first woman to hold that post.

Mrs. William E. Borah is one of the few senatorial wives of senatorial stock both by birth and marriage. Mrs. Borah is the daughter of the late William J. McConnell of Boise, who, together with the late George L. Shoup, was a member of the first senatorial pair from Idaho. Mrs. Borah met her husband for the first time when he, as a young orator of twenty-five, was making speeches for her father in his senatorial campaign.

Jordan Herbert Stabler is evidently possessed of a versatile genius. Formerly a member of the American diplomatic service, now by way of being a radio magnate, he has just appeared in a new rôle. Mr. Stabler has recently published his translations into English of the verse of the Portuguese poet, Antonio Castro Feijo. Feijo, now deceased, was once a diplomatic colleague of Mr. Stabler when the latter was secretary of the American legation at Stockholm.

The new ambassador from Russia, M. Boris Bakhetoff, is acknowledged by his colleagues to be one of the most astute members of his profession. He is an engineer, not a professional diplomat, hydraulics having been his specialty in his preëmbassy days. Like all cultured Russians, M. Bakhetoff is polyglot. His English, French, and German are said to be perfect. The new ambassador has thrown open the embassy on Friday mornings to the Russian relief organization of which Princess Cataczene is the leader.

Gray Silver, whose odd name is apt to be confounded with an alloy for currency, is the "legislative agent" of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the great trust of agricultural organizations throughout the country. It is said that even the "farm bloc," of which Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas is the chief, takes its orders from the A. F. B. F. Mr. Silver, who has the farmers' problems at the tip of his tongue, is regarded by some as almost the most powerful individual in Washington, and is certainly a force to be reckoned with by both houses.

Hermann H. Kohlsaat, veteran Chicago newspaper publisher, is gathering material for his political memoirs, about to appear serially under the title "From McKinley to Harding." They are said to abound in hitherto unpublished matter. Mr. Kohlsaat, who was born in Illinois in 1853, owns several large baking establishments in addition to his part ownerships of various newspapers. He has at various times been editor and publisher of the Chicago Times-Herald, of the Chicago Evening Post, editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, and of the Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Dr. Otto Weidfeldt, appointed recently as ambassador from Germany, is far from being a stranger at Washington. He has been for years one of the foremost economists and students of political science in Germany and has traveled extensively in this country in pursuit of his studies. The new ambassador is a very rich man—his princely income being derived from the famous Krupp works, of which he is general director. However, he is a rigid economist and has notified his government that he will not be concerned with social duties at his new post. The new German government does not provide immense funds for entertaining which previous ambassadors of the empire enjoyed—hence Dr. Weidfeldt's announcement. Dr. Weidfeldt is a friend of Lloyd George, whom he has known since the early years of this century. Their friendship survived the bitterness of the great war and flourishes as prosperously as ever.

OLD FAVORITES.

Duncan Gray.

Duncan Gray cam here to woo,
Ha, ha, the wooing o't,
On blythe Yule night when we were fou,
Ha, ha, the wooing o't;
Maggie coost her head fu' high,
Look'd askint and unco skeigh,
Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh;
Ha, ha, the wooing o't!

Duncan fleech'd, and Duncan pray'd;
Meg was deaf as Ailsa Craig;
Duncan sigh'd baith out and in,
Grat his een baith bleer't and blin',
Spak o' lowpin ower a linn!

Time and chance are but a tide,
Slighted love is sair to bide;
Shall I, like a fool, quoth he,
For a haughty hizzie dee?
She may gae to—France for me!

How it comes let doctors tell,
Meg grew sick—as he grew heal;
Something in her bosom wrings,
For relief a sigh she brings;
And O, her een, they spak sic things!

Duncan was a lad o' grace;
Ha, ha, the wooing o't!
Maggie's was a piteous case;
Ha, ha, the wooing o't!
Duncan couldna be her death,
Swelling pity smoor'd his wrath;
Now they're crouse and canty baith;
Ha, ha, the wooing o't! —Robert Burns.

The Green Linnet.

Beneath these fruit-tree boughs that shed
Their snow-white blossoms on my head,
With brightest sunshine round me spread
Of spring's unclouded weather,
In this sequestered nook how sweet
To sit upon my orchard-seat!
And birds and flowers once more to greet,
My last year's friends together.

One have I marked, the happiest guest
In all this covert of the blest:
Hail to Thee, far above the rest
In joy of voice and pinion!
Thou, Linnet! in thy green array,
Presiding Spirit here today,
Dost lead the revels of the May,
And this is thy dominion.

While birds, and butterflies, and flowers,
Make all one band of paramours,
Thou, ranging up and down the bowers,
Art sole in thy employment;
A Life, a Presence like the Air,
Scattering thy gladness without care,
Too blest with any one to pair,
Thyself thy own enjoyment.

Amid yon tuft of hazel trees,
That twinkle to the gusty breeze,
Behold him perch'd in ecstasies,
Yet seeming still to hover;
There! where the flutter of his wings
Upon his back and body flings
Shadows and sunny glimmerings,
That cover him all over.

My dazzled sight he oft deceives—
A Brother of the dancing leaves;
Then flits, and from the cottage-eaves
Pours forth his song in gushes;
As if by that exulting strain
He mocked and treated with disdain
The voiceless Form he chose to feign,
While fluttering in the bushes.
—William Wordsworth.

The War Song of Dinas Vawr.

The mountain sheep are sweeter,
But the valley sheep are fatter;
We therefore deemed it meet
To carry off the latter.
We made an expedition;
We met a host, and quelled it;
We forced a strong position,
And killed the men who held it.

On Dyfed's richest valley,
Where herds of kine were browsing,
We made a mighty rally
To furnish our carousing.
Fierce warriors rushed to meet us;
We met them, and o'erthrew them:
They struggled hard to beat us;
But we conquered them, and slew them.

As we drove our prize at leisure,
The king marched forth to catch us;
His rage surpassed all measure,
But his people could not match us.
He fled to his hall-pillars;
And, ere our force we led off,
Some sacked his house and cellars,
While others cut his head off.

We there, in strife bewildering,
Spilt blood enough to swim in:
We orphaned many children,
And widowed many women.
The eagles and the ravens
We glutted with our foemen;
The heroes and the cravens,
The spearmen and the bowmen.

We brought away from battle,
And much their land bemoaned them,
Two thousand head of cattle,
And the head of him who owned them:
Ednyfed, King of Dyfed,
His head was borne before us;
His wine and beasts supplied our feasts,
And his overthrow, our chorus.
—Thomas Love Peacock.

ANOTHER AMERICAN DIARY.

Clare Sheridan Adds Her Quota to the Foreign Gallery of American Impressions

If comparisons are odious, superlatives come in for at least their full share of odium. If we weren't the newest, biggest, richest, loudest, and according to our dearly loved critics, crudest of all countries, it is just possible that every foreign notable would not be called upon to leave to a curious posterity his precise reactions to our unicity. As it is, we must grin and bear our superlative burden alone while other nations come to criticize our dollar-made culture and remain to worship the first half of our formula. Briefly, although we feel that we can not go another American diary of foreign origin—we have no qualms for the home-grown product, as it is one of our native peculiarities, duly recorded by visiting diarists, that we regard the daily mirror of existence askance—we yet know that we will be called upon to read, laurelize, and disseminate perhaps myriad others, of which at least one, Margot's, is already before our satiated mind's eye.

It is perhaps a bit hard on the diarist of today and tomorrow to have to inherit our prejudice against his predecessor of yesterday. But since diarying is not an indispensable trade, and as the finished product is not an essential art, we refuse even to temper our reaction. Clare Sheridan speculates as to the humanness of Americans:

I motored back to Burlingame and hurriedly dressed and arrived extremely late at a dinner party. Wine flowed, and restored my jaded spirits. I looked round the table at the brilliant, cheerful, noisy company and a new thought came to me. I found myself pondering on the high moral standard imposed by the United States. Continually I ask myself this question: "Is the United States more moral than any other country? Are the men and women human, or has legislation and public opinion extinguished the devil that lives in human frames?" I find no answer.

We should like to supply one answer at least—that we are neither so inhuman nor so patient as we look. Even we, O Foreign Diarists, have our reactions.

The latter, however, are not, strictly speaking, the subject of this paper, which purports to be a review of Clare Sheridan's book. To do Mrs. Sheridan justice, she came to this country for a two-fold purpose. Of course, like Margot's, the mainspring of the visit was to make money. But, after all, that is every one's motive. Mrs. Sheridan's secondary though equally legitimate purpose was to sculpt portrait busts of eminent or rich Americans. Unfortunately for both projects, up to the close of "My American Diary" she found that our countrymen were not prone to have their ugliness immortalized in marble. The average great man is not a beauty and is busy. The result is obvious. We hope Mrs. Sheridan turned her attention to our upper-class women, who usually are both beautiful and idle. But she prefers men:

Mr. Liveright took me to lunch at the Dutch Treat Club. I knew nothing about it, nor by whom I was invited—and when we got up to the room in the elevator (we were late), it appeared that I was the only woman, among what seemed to me about seventy men. Had it been seventy women instead of men, I should have gone down in the elevator by which I came up. But I can stand this sort of party every day in the week! They were all very polite and the whole room rose to its feet as I came in.

Her taste is perhaps not strange when you reflect that Clare Sheridan, though considerable of a beauty herself, is one of the women who should have been a man. Six feet in stature, an adventurous disposition, and a genuine passion for work are not the attributes of the feminine woman.

To stop hedging and get back to "My American Diary," Mrs. Sheridan has written a series of slight sketches of the Americans who crossed her path. If the impressions of an unprejudiced visitor are superior to those of an informed one, some of our diarist's should be valuable indeed:

Mr. Liveright, my publisher, fetched me and took me to the Ritz, where we dined with Mr. Pulitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Swope, and Mr. B. M. Baruch. Mr. Pulitzer looks much too young to be the owner of the World and has the face of a well-bred Englishman. Mr. Baruch (whose name I mistook for Brooke) has white hair, fine features, and stands 6 feet 4. I gathered from the general conversation that I was talking to some one whom I should have heard of, and as I could think of no distinguished Brooke but Rupert Brooke, the poet, I asked if he was related. And then Mr. Baruch rather reprovingly spelt his name for me. Instantly by a faint glimmer of memory "Wall Street" came to my mind, and I seemed to have heard in London that he was a friend of Winston. He was interesting and unprejudiced.

But it is part of our foreign critics' make-up to consider American affairs not worthy of research till they are to be capitalized as first-hand impressions. Hence this pristine freshness—!

However, it is part of the game that we should know all about our visiting celebrities or else have it recorded against us that Americans are ignorant:

Soukine fetched me for dinner at Countess Gizycka's. Senator Edge took me in to dinner—I was sent in first as the guest of honor. On my other side was Mr. Lowry, whom I had met at tea at Mrs. Hard's. We stumbled in the course of conversation on a mutual friendship with Henry James. It happened by chance, but it was a happy chance. He loved Henry as all Henry's friends did. He nursed him through his last illness. Mr. Lowry had not guessed that I was the Sheridan to whom the best of Henry James' letters were written in the last volume. That tag of Soviet Russia which is tied tightly round my neck had obliterated any idea of my being any one else! We talked of Rye, and of my own home, and the mention of Brede Place recalled to my vision spring in England, the peace and the remoteness of Sussex; "so far away," as Mr. Lowry said. So far away, indeed, that it seems like another world, and sometimes I wonder if I'll ever get back there.

Speaking of James, Mrs. Sheridan's most interesting story—from the present reviewer's standpoint—is not one of her impressions of current America, but an old story of Henry James that her cousin, Travers Jerome, told her:

He told me rather a sweet story about Henry James, whom he apparently took down to the East Side to show him around. To meet him, he invited Meyer Shonfeld, a Jewish sweatshop operator. He thought Meyer was the most opposite pole to Henry, and that it would be interesting. To Meyer, he said, "Study this man Henry James. He is a de-nationalized American, and I want your opinion of him." Henry, he says, was at his best that night; he, so to speak, threw off his veil, and was, what so seldom happened, the simple unmasked Henry. Afterwards, when they parted, Meyer turned to Travers, and with a glow of enthusiasm, said, "He's a real man! aint he—?" Surely as high a tribute as our beloved Henry ever received.

And probably the second most interesting is the light thrown on the personality of the author's aunt, Lady Randolph Churchill. Mrs. Sheridan received the sad news of Lady Churchill's death while she was sojourning in Mexico. All the world knows Lady Churchill, and the bits of intimate history that Clare Sheridan records in her diary are of interest to every one. Lady Churchill had played the rôle of foster-mother to her niece, whose tribute to her revered relative is as follows:

She had the rarest qualities, and the largest heart, which made her lovable. She was "worldly-wise," yet neither wise nor worldly. She loved passionately and generously as her heart dictated, and always she gave out more than she received. She married three times, and twice in a wayward and unworldly fashion. Partly what I am today is the result of her early influence. I used to admire and love her in a rather awe-struck way when I was a child, and when I was seventeen I believed she could do no wrong. Her judgment seemed to me infallible. In those days we lived exactly opposite, in great Cumberland Place, London, and I used to sit with her every morning and while she dressed I was made to read the leading articles in the Times. I was very shy, having ran wild for years in Ireland. Aunt Jennie took the raw and untamed girl, taught her how to do her hair; made her put on her clothes with care, and scolded her into a civilized woman. She used to say to me: "While you are dressing, put your mind to it, and do the best you can with yourself. After that, never give your appearance another thought." She would scold me unmercifully if I did not make an effort to talk to whatever man I sat next to at luncheon or dinner: "Remember you are asked, not for your amusement, but to contribute something to the party. . . ." The letters of Lord Chesterfield to his son were as nothing compared to the worldly advice of Jennie Churchill to her niece.

Mrs. Sheridan had, it seems, heard about Mr. Hearst and was panting to record her impressions of our most-talked-of publisher. Up to date, however, she was disappointed and could give us only the benefit of the diffused rays of his satellites:

We talked about the absent Mr. Hearst, whom I realize is a great storm centre in this country. I must meet him before my curiosity can be allayed. I want to get my own impression of him. Russia has taught me that individuals are not as the world says they are. Mrs. Hearst, who is very pretty, was treated like a queen. Men sat on the floor at her feet, admiringly, and social reformers sat at her elbow beseechingly, and she smiled and assented, and listened and promised, and did all that a perfectly good queen should do, and like a perfectly real queen, jewel crowned, she arose and left before any one else. But not without my telephone number and address. Mr. Brisbane eventually dropped me home in his car, he, too, promised, in the name of the queen, that I should meet Hearst, and maybe—who knows?

Occasionally, Mrs. Sheridan's Soviet soul bursts forth in socialistic indignation. She resents the fact that the Morgans do not throw open their home to the public on certain days. The idea is evidently that so much that is rich and rare should not be kept for the delectation of a few while the many are thirsting to refresh their eyes with the genuine Botticellis, Cellinis, and Michael Angelos. A noble thought, but one can not help sympathizing with the Morgans in not wishing to take the final step towards converting their home into a museum:

Mrs. Morgan and her daughter and son were there, the mother looked like their sister. The atmosphere of restraint and politeness among themselves gave one the impression of being with Austrian royals.

Florie Grenfell took me over the library. It is a wonderful place, and inconceivable that it is a private possession. Everything is arranged and labeled as though it were a public museum. Even the bibelots have their labels, and the smallest thing on a shelf is a priceless work of art. There was a little bronze Benvenuto Cellini, a Michael Angelo baby head, a Botticelli on an easel—etc., etc. I asked if the place were open certain days of the week to the public, but was told no.

Later, on being told that the police had ceased to hold themselves responsible for Mr. Morgan's life, Mrs. Sheridan reflects that if he "metaphorically shook hands with the world, he'd be as safe as, for instance, our Prince of Wales." She overlooks the fact that by shooting the Prince of Wales the assassin merely creates another heir to the throne. Whereas killing Mr. Morgan does not duplicate Mr. Morgan. It is a less thankless job than the hypothetical murder of the prince.

Even more than Mr. Hearst, Mrs. Sheridan wished to meet Charlie Chaplin, and here at least luck was with her. Her other impressions of Hollywood are practically submerged by Charlie and rumors of Charlie:

I dined, a small party, at the house of Gouverneur Morris. We had a Chinese dinner, especially prepared by his Chinese cook. All through dinner the conversation was of Charlie Chaplin, his looks, his individuality, incidents in their friendship, and what I had missed. Never a word of criticism did I hear, every one talked of him with appreciation and affection, almost with pride. He had talked of me, they said. He had distributed "Mayfair to Moscow" among his friends, and most people thought we knew one another intimately. Finally I found myself, too, calling him "Charlie." . . . I feel like one who does not personally know the great, but know some one who does and writes home about it! After dinner we left the men, and went on a voyage of exploration round the house, which is bungalow in type, and very attractive and then in the bathroom we paused to powder our noses. In the bathroom we remained, three of us, perched on the baths' edge, forgot the men, and drifted into conversation which was all absorbing.

Of the same party she did record one non-Charlie impression:

One girl was a film actress with bobbed straight glossy henna hair. Her face was much made up, her mouth might have been of any other design than the painted one. She was decorative and futuristic and I liked looking at her. She intrigued me. The other girl was a vivacious and restless continuity-writer. Both were very young. They talked unreservedly about their love affairs, and I listened enraptured, as to a story of De Maupassant. In the end we were agreed that marriage would spoil everything and then the men, impatient of our absence, came and banged upon the bathroom door.

However, Charlie himself is the main interest in the Hollywood sojourn:

When he asked me about my work in this country, I explained that the United States had made of me a writer instead of a sculptor, and I told him my view of the American man who is so modest that he thinks it is a vanity to have his bust done.

"He does not mind having his portrait painted," I said, "he has grown accustomed to the idea. But he exaggerates the importance of a portrait bust. In fact he is quite unsimple, in his point of view, almost self-conscious—" and Charlie, looking at me half shyly, half humorously, as he sat tucked away in a sofa corner, under the light of the lamp: "I'm vain!" he said—"Thank goodness!" I said. And so we fixed it right away—that I will linger here until his bust is done.

On the way back to Hollywood Hotel, where he dropped me in his car, we had a discussion on marriage. He has the chivalry, and the instinct to protect, I maintained my fanaticism of freedom.

He is a strange little man with a great big soul. He made me think of Francis Thompson's essay on Shelley, in which he said that Shelley tired not so much of a woman's arms, as of her soul. It seemed to me that it was more a spiritual than a physical companionship that Charlie is subconsciously searching for, in his heart.

Our diarist had at last secured an order for a bust, and what was a greater event, succeeded in getting Charlie to sit for it without more ado:

Three whole days I have worked on that bust, with a concentration of effort that is exhausting. It is finished—I feel tonight the elation of a girl out of school. Moreover, I can sleep without the anxiety due to an unfinished work. Charlie is pleased, and I—well, I am never satisfied, but I am conscious of having accomplished my best. His friends who know his restless and capricious nature are surprised that he gave me those three whole days. I was fortunate, of course, in meeting him immediately upon his return, before he was reëngulfed in work. Moreover, with some perception, I planted myself with my materials in his house, and as I wanted him bare throated I begged him not to dress. A man in pajamas and dressing-gown does not suddenly get a notion to order his motor and go off to some place. I had him fairly anchored. Nevertheless he has been difficult to do. There is so much subtlety in the face, and sensitiveness, and all his varying personalities arrayed themselves before me, and had to be embodied into one interpretation.

Charlie would get down from the model stand and observe the progress through half-closed eyes. Once he said: "I wish this was not me, so that I could admire it as I please. I find him very interesting, this fellow you have made!"

We are grateful to Mrs. Sheridan for the scraps of Chaplin philosophy of which the following is typical:

He was trying to tell me what he thought was the ultimate aim of all our effort. He maintained that no artist would do great work until all petty ambition was obliterated.

"There must be no dreams of posterity, of immortality, no desire for admiration, for after all what are these worth . . . at best 1000 years hence people might walk round your immortal stone and say—it certainly is beautiful; yes, it is wonderful—(and Charlie acted the part)—Who did you say did it? Clare Sheridan 950 years ago—"and then," said Charlie, "in five minutes they will be saying, 'Where is that motor, I told him to be back in thirty-five minutes'—"—There is nothing, he said, so beautiful, that will make people forget their eggs and bacon for breakfast—as for admiration of the world—it's not worth anything—there is in the end but oneself to please—"You make something because it means something to you. You work, because you have a superabundance of vital energy, you find that not only you can make children but you can express yourself in other ways—in the end it is you—all you—your work, your thought, your conception of the beautiful, yours the happiness—yours the satisfaction; be brave enough to face the veil, and lift it, and see and know the void it hides, and stand before that void and know that within yourself is your world—"

Press agents may bellow the contrary to the winds, but the fact remains that "there is in the end but oneself to please." In so far as Mrs. Sheridan is a genuine advocate of this creed of the true artist, we admire her work, her energy, and her aims. But with all due respect to her ability as a sculptor and her native artistic temperament, we wish she would leave books to the professional writer. She says that America has made a writer of her. Even America is not that omnipotent. Why is it that of all the arts writing alone is thought to need no training? Any one can write is the average opinion. Mrs. Sheridan has a bright, chatty manner that will insure her readers, beyond a doubt. But her book is practically formless and the style is hectically feminine—the letter-writing style of the cultured lady. It is high time some one started a campaign against homebrew literature.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending April 22, 1922, were $140,600,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $125,800,000; an increase of $14,800,000.

Activity on the advance or on the decline has always been taken, in commodity as well as security markets, to indicate confirmation of the prevailing trend. That is why the active buying of steel, which came into the market following the advances made in the price sheets of the independent steel companies and followed by the United States appear to be headed for higher prices over the next year or two. Steel bonds, despite the acute depression throughout the industry, have held very well all through the bear market in steel stocks, because it was well recognized that steel companies have laid away substantial amounts of surplus earnings out of their large war profits and that the mortgage securities of these concerns had little to fear from several months of bad business. And, now that the industry is again on the upgrade, the position of these bonds is rendered doubly secure.

In addition to their well-bulwarked position, most of these securities are protected by sinking funds which operate to reduce the floating supply; and many of them are redeemable at substantial premiums.

This latter feature has particularly interesting possibilities in the case of bonds of Steel Corporation subsidiaries. At the close of 1921, the Steel Corporation had cash and marketable securities of $255,243,997, as compared without $64,000,000 in 1914. At the same time net working capital has increased from $227,000,000 to $485,182,775. It would seem that the corporation is now in a position where it might be good policy to retire some of the subsidiary bonds out of surplus quick assets which may not for a time find full employment in the ordinary channels of its business.

Illinois Steel debenture 4½s and Indiana Steel first 5s are callable at 105 and interest. Both these issues are guaranteed unconditionally as to principal and interest by the Steel Corporation. They are substantial investments. The Steel Corporation second lien, sinking fund 5s are redeemable at 110 and interest, which is rather too high to permit of hopes of redemption en bloc. They have always been given a high investment rating, however, and in the past it has been the policy of the corporation to regularly invest its surplus funds in these securities.

The Bethlehem Steel Company first and refunding 5s, which may now be bought to return 5.4 per cent., were part of the pre-war funded debt, and they are now very strongly secured by earning power and physical property. They are a mortgage upon the entire property, now owned or hereafter acquired (except a few parcels of real estate), subject to the purchase money 6s and the first extension 5s. They are guaranteed principal and interest by the Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

Colorado Fuel & Iron has gradually been getting its properties into better condition, and this process has been helped considerably by the conservative dividend policy of its directors. The general 5s, of which only $5,160,000 are outstanding, are secured by a mortgage on the entire property, and are redeemable at 105 and interest on any February 1st for the sinking fund.

The Lackawanna Steel Company has reduced its funded debt, including that of subsidiaries, nearly $20,000,000 since 1914, placing the outstanding securities in a much stronger position than before the war. In 1920, bond interest was earned nearly five times over. The conversion privilege formerly carried by consolidated 5s of 1950 expired last February. These bonds are a direct obligation of the company, secured by a first mortgage on the manufacturing plant at Lackawanna, New York, subject to the first 5s. They are also a first lien on the capital stock of the Ellsworth Collieries and a second lien on about 90 per cent. of the capital stock of the Lackawanna Iron & Steel Company of Pennsylvania, and other stocks.

The Midvale Steel convertible sinking fund 5s are a direct obligation of the company, secured by deposit of all the capital stock of the Cambria Steel Company acquired or to be acquired. The conversion privilege is not attractive. Midvale has developed a rather substantial earning power under normal conditions and has built up a large profit and loss surplus out of earnings of the past six years. Total interest charges were earned fully five and one-half times over in 1920.

Republic Iron & Steel sinking fund 5s are the only mortgage security of the Republic Iron & Steel Company, with the exception of a small amount of subsidiary company bonds outstanding. They are a first mortgage on all its property now owned or hereafter acquired, being subject to only $234,000 bonds of the Martin & Paine Coal Company. It is provided in the mortgage that the net quick assets shall at all times equal at least 40 per cent. of the amount of bonds outstanding.

Business conditions in California in 1921 are accurately reflected in the annual report of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, which has just been issued.

During the year the company had a revenue of $8,974,264 from freight traffic, a decrease of 25.39 per cent., and a revenue from passengers of $2,324,507, a decrease of 13.83 per cent., compared with 1920. The actual surplus from operations was $486,083. Taxes were $1,230,981 and much heavier than in preceding years.

President C. M. Levey in his report says: "The decrease in freight revenue is largely due to widespread business depression; to the heavy arrivals by water of foreign coal at San Francisco, and to Panama Canal competition. With the transcontinental railroads the Panama Canal competition is an exceedingly important factor, as the rail lines are subjected to unregulated competition by steamers. Under existing laws, rail-borne traffic between the states is under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the water-borne traffic between the same states is wholly unregulated."

President Levey is optimistic as to the future, declaring that the 1922 outlook is better. The Western Pacific added materially to its trackage and facilities in 1921, among the principal additions and betterments being the following:

Niles-San Jose line completed.

It is not that the plants and the men and the ability are lacking in Germany, but it is the fact that raw materials are not abundant that would appear to prevent German competition being seriously felt in this country, and perhaps even in most competitive markets abroad. There has been such a dearth in the last few years in railroad buying and in building operations that business from these sources should increase immensely during 1922.

The steel companies that piled up nothing but deficits last year should now be able to make a more satisfactory showing. There is reason to believe that the merger plans among various independent concerns will be consummated, and, of course, in this general connection there would be furious speculation in the related shares. Already one combination has been effected, Replogle Steel having taken over Empire Steel and Iron, which will at once place Replogle in position to do something more than a banking business.

The spectacle of advancing prices throughout the list has naturally encouraged a great increase in the buying demand on the part of the public. Investors and speculators are coming back into the market in a manner most agreeable to brokers, who have put in some pretty hard years. Certainly the "million-share" days would naturally lead the bear element to feel that the market was overdue for a big reaction, and whenever any weak spots appear there will be plenty of bears ready to attack the market. However, it is possible that not for long months past have there been so many buying orders under the market here and there, placed by the outside public and by large interests who seem to be willing to continue their accumulations of securities that promise well in the future.

Our railroads have demonstrated in the main their ability to curtail expenses to such an extent as to permit of very liberal increase in net earnings, notwithstanding gross earnings have been showing declines, and this, of course, encourages holders of such securities to the belief that not only their dividends are secure, but that many rails not now on the dividend-paying list will within the next year or so be reinstated as paying securities.

So far as public utilities are concerned, they have shown remarkable recuperative powers. Their costs of operation have been coming down and their earnings and their gross business have been increasing in general with more prosperous business conditions. There are a great many public utilities that offer excellent opportunities for long-pull investment and speculation.—The Trader.

The annual meeting of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company was held at headquarters in San Francisco, April 11th. The outgoing directors were reelected and at a subsequent meeting all the officers, headed by W. E. Creed.

Features of the meeting were reports of Vice-President and General Manager John A. Britton and Second Vice-President and Treasurer A. F. Hockenbeamer. Some of the salient points of Britton's report were:

The company's operations now embrace thirty-six counties of Northern California, supplying a territory containing an estimated population of 2,000,000. The number of consumers served is 598,969, representing a gain of 29,610 above the total for the preceding year. The annual expenditure in the state for materials, salaries, dividends, and bond interest amounts to upwards of thirty million dollars. It employs 8213 men and women. The total payroll for 1921 was over $13,000,000.

The operating revenues from all departments for the year 1921 totaled $36,933,474, of which 61 per cent. was derived from electric sales, 34 per cent. from gas sales, and the remaining 5 per cent. from water, steam, and street railway operations. Operating revenues increased $2,457,514 over the year 1920. Operating expenses amounted to $27,348,162, distributed as follows: Labor, $8,464,590; fuel oil, $6,611,716; power purchased, materials and supplies and miscellaneous, $4,456,817; taxes, $3,265,895; rentals for lease of other plant, $950,066; reserve for casualty and uncollectible accounts, $530,000; reserve for depreciation, $3,069,078. Operating expenses increased $1,102,220 over 1920.

The gross expenditures for additions and betterments during 1921, not including the leased properties of the Sierra and San Francisco Power Company, amounted to $18,651,563. Important units of construction work completed last year were: Steam electric plants—Oakland, 16,756 horsepower; hydroelectric plants—Spring Gap, Tuolumne County, 10,056 horsepower; Hat Creek, Shasta County (two plants), 33,512 horsepower. One hundred and sixty miles of high-tension transmission line were completed and put in operation.

High-pressure gas mains were placed in service from Sacramento to Woodland and from San Jose to Los Gatos. Good progress was made on the first large unit of the Pit River development, which is scheduled for completion on September 1, 1922, and will provide an additional 94,000 horsepower.

The Equitable Eastern Banking Corporation in its statement of condition at the close of business March 30, 1922, shows undivided profits of $307,320.38, with total capital, surplus, and undivided profits figured at $2,807,320.38. The Equitable Eastern Banking Corporation, a subsidiary of the Equitable Trust Company of New York, was organized in December, 1920, for the purpose of developing the Far Eastern business then being done by the Equitable Trust Company. It has offices at 37 Wall Street, New York, and at 1 Kiu-kiang Road, Shanghai.

The Stamp of Approval

The only bond buyer who can afford to make a really thorough, first-hand investigation of a bond is the bond house that originally buys the issue for resale to its clients.

The individual investor must rely upon the "underwriting house" to establish the permanent safety and investment merit of the bonds he buys. Indeed, to him that is the primary function of the bond house.

The clients of Blyth, Witter & Co. have come to place a fine faith in the integrity and conservatism of our underwritings. They know that every bond we sell must measure up to high standards of safe investment—or otherwise, we would not recommend it.

Perhaps you have funds now waiting for investment. If you are of a conservative turn of mind on such matters, you will find the bonds we sell to be good bonds for you to buy. An inquiry places you under no obligation.

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

April, the supposed anniversary of Shakespeare's birth, has brought forth the usual bloom of fresh research and the usual burst of interest in Elizabethan affairs. At least two books have been published with direct reference to the date. One appears in the Duffield series, "Master Spirits of Literature," and is a popular life of the Bard of Avon by Raymond M. Alden, professor of English in Stanford University. The other, published by the Atlantic Monthly Press, is an unusual little book called "A Glance Toward Shakespeare," by John Jay Chapman.

Professor Alden's book, "Shakespeare," is of the handbook reference variety. It would make an excellent text for a Freshman or Sophomore Shakespeare course. That is to say, it is thorough and authentic and has the classified form of a text-book or a doctor's thesis. The age of Shakespeare is a valuable summary that any reader may be grateful for, and is in fact the most brilliant chapter of the book. For the rest it is a clearly written "life" that separates the wheat from the chaff and bulks its finds conveniently under definitive headings.

Mr. Chapman, in his cursory "Glance Toward Shakespeare," has played about his subject, darting here and there and occasionally scaling the heights with the insouciance of acrobacy. And like the sure-footed artist of the tight-rope, Mr. Chapman stops at will to execute an original flourish that leaves one breathless with admiration. He is concerned, for instance, about our modern inability to keep step with Shakespeare's light prancing measures. We are too heavy. Says Mr. Chapman apropos of a modern Shakespeare production: "Where poetry, foolery, and philosophy meet, as they do in these sylvan scenes—all of them tinged with a world that has long ago disappeared—we are like burglars dancing a minuet." However, elsewhere, viewing Elizabethan drama from another angle, Mr. Chapman opines that only the most ardent student of today would care to attend a genuine Shakespeare performance. His logical reconstruction of such an event is a practically sceneless piece in which the actors streamed across the stage, reciting their lines at a normal speaking rate. Our author argues that this must have been so because of the extreme length of many of the plays. And it is a rational supposition in view of the fact that English stagecraft was in its infancy. Nor was it a coincidence that the greatest dramas were produced in that primitive era. They were great—in our opinion—because they were free—untrammelled by tradition. The precise reason why no successor to Shakespeare has been so great is because he was paralyzed by Shakespeare's greatness.

In this opinion, however, we run counter to Mr. Chapman, who holds that English literature owes its greatness to its inspiration by the dramatist from Stratford and that we are now in grave danger of losing that inspiration with the downfall of the Shakespearean tradition, which, by the way, was at its height in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. It is to those eras that we must turn for the rejuvenation of dramatic art, according to our author. Kemble and Garrick and Siddons may have acted Shakespeare as it has never been acted before or since, but it is not by exhuming the mummies of their art that we can recreate another. And though the cult of Shakespeare has undoubtedly been responsible for English culture, it has not been the source of English masterpieces. These rare phenomena have flourished rather in spite of the Shakespearean blast. And though the Bard has indubitably influenced the course of English letters it has been a malignant influence. For our native muse has been rather in the position of a precocious genius, who, having shot his bolt at twenty, fears to write more lest he dim his too early and too easily won laurels.

Aside from his theory of the indispensability of tradition—and tradition is essential, but unfortunately Anglo-Saxons have had an overdose of the precious essence—we cordially concur with Mr. Chapman's finds. Among the most amusing is his disquisition to the effect that Shakespeare could not draw a villain. Another happy flourish is this: "They are gay people, the English, and except when they try to be clever, are the cleverest people in the world"—a mot that we wickedly hope comes to the attention of Mr. Chesterton, whose cleverness is spoiled for the discerning—among whom we class ourselves—by its self-consciousness, which in turn is extraordinarily English.

A summary of these proportions is literally inadequate to suggest the real wealth in Mr. Chapman's paper. His 115 pages of synthetic criticism defy further condensation, and one can only refer the curious to "A Glance Toward Shakespeare," whose cleverness and refreshing discernment will reward alike the most wearied student of literature and the most casual reader.

Notes of Books and Authors.

Louis Joseph Vance was a husband at eighteen and a father at twenty; so he felt that it behooved him to augment his salary—that of a clerk in a New York telephone office—by writing a novel. He mapped out a plan by which he wrote fifteen hundred words nightly. He finished his novel on schedule time and took it to Munsey's Magazine, where it was accepted. Then he resigned his telephone job and methodically set about to become a professional writer. His latest novel, "Linda Lee, Incorporated," purports to give an inside picture of motion-picture life in Hollywood. Mr. Vance writes from first-hand knowledge of the moving-picture world.

M. André Maurois, the witty author of "The Silences of Colonel Bramble" and "General Bramble," is a cloth manufacturer at Elbœuf.

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, who is a brother of Sir Philip Gibbs and Mr. A. Hamilton Gibbs, has written a new novel entitled "The Rustle of Silk."

A new volume is appearing in the Cambridge Historical Series—a history of Holland. This means that the historical studies published in this series, and which were held up by the war, are again being pursued. Sir George W. Prothero is the editor of the Cambridge Historical Series and the brother of Lord Ernle, who was Mr. Rowland Prothero, editor of the Quarterly Review, before he was entitled. Sir George Prothero succeeded him as editor of the Quarterly.

The country house in the Kent village of Downe, near Orpington, where Charles Darwin lived is being offered for sale. It was thither, the London Daily Chronicle says, that Gladstone walked with Sir John Lubbock and the future Viscount Morley on a memorable Sunday afternoon recorded in Morley's "Life of Gladstone." Morley refers to Darwin's humble sense of the honor of this visit.

The Princeton University Press has recently published a fourth and revised edition of "Heredity and Environment in the Development of Men," by Edwin Grant Conklin, professor of biology in Princeton University. This is the eighth printing of the book since its appearance in 1915.

Edgar Lee Masters' new book, "Children of the Market Place," besides being a novel is a study of this country of the years of 1833 to 1900. It is written in the form of an imaginary autobiography—the supposed reminiscences of an American pioneer.

Dean Inge, famous English churchman, and one of the subjects of "Painted Windows," the Gentleman with the Duster's new book, writes as follows in a review of the English edition: "The Gentleman with the Duster has exaggerated my intellectual even more than my physical stature, which is known to the police (for passport purposes, I hasten to add) as 5 feet 10 inches. He is very impolite about my clothes, most of which were manufactured by a competent clerical tailor as recently as 1913."

Another convention is shortly to be staged at Washington, this time one of American booksellers. Price standardization is to be one of the outstanding features for discussion at the forthcoming meeting, beginning May

The Stevens-Kelly Price Maintenance Bill is of vital interest and importance to booksellers and publishers; it is being supported by practically every national commercial body in the country. More booksellers are expected to attend the convention this year than ever before.

From "Medieval Contributions to Civilization," by Hearnshaw and others, just published by Holt: "In the thirteenth century Pierre Dubois, a French lawyer, was foreshadowing the modern medical missionary by suggesting that women should be taught languages, surgery, medicine, and the rubrics and canons of the church, as a preliminary to work in the East. It is only fair to add that Pierre Dubois' ends were more medieval than his means. He wanted to recover the Holy Land. His women doctors were to marry intelligent infidels or schismatics, cure their bodily diseases first, and then take advantage of their gratitude to wheedle them out of their theological errors." Surely an infallible and original method!

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

Esther and Bernice.

When an eminent author chooses to translate a foreign masterpiece rather than produce one himself, there is something pleasing in his modesty. There is interest also in the comparison he invites between his own qualities and those of his model, and in the disclosure of his literary preferences. But one is also led to suspect, fairly or not, that the springs of his creative impulse are running dry.

The reason for this may be that although many great author have applied themselves to translation, they have been writers of a more imitative and formal bent than Mr. Masfield. Among the high originators of thought and emotion few have cared to spend their gifts on mere "rendition." They have had too much of their own to say. And Mr. Masfield belongs with them rather than with the refashioners, decorators, polishers, or whatever one chooses to call those who are mainly preoccupied with perfection of form.

In fact, form and Mr. Masfield have generally been on rather uneasy terms. Some of his greatest things have been done in a kind of impetuous intolerance of formalism—"The Dauber," for example. But like most writers of a headlong temperament he has a profound respect for the quality least natural to him and has at times addressed himself to acquiring it.

It was this, perhaps, no less than his flair for braveries of action and high color that attracted him into the drama, and it is this that bars him from entire success in that art. As regards construction, his plays often give an impression of laborious artifice relieved by a rebellious and irrepressible beauty. Only in the "Tragedy of Nan" are form and emotion fused in a fluid harmony which, despite its tinge of melodrama, approaches, in its rhythmic, fatal progression, the finest product of Greek drama.

We do not pretend to fathom how this happened. His failure in other similar attempts is not enlightening. But his success here may have helped lure him toward more distinctively classical austerities, as in the present translations from Racine.

If these are to be followed, as seems not unlikely, by creative attempts in a style nearer the classical model than "Pompey the Great," it will be apparent that Mr. Masfield has mistaken his great but peculiar powers. At any rate "Esther" is a mistake. It has a certain fine, clear coldness, more or less appropriate to Racine, but there are a great many authors who could have done this as well as Mr. Masfield, without hoping to rival him in his own field. As a matter of fact, they might have done it a great deal better. For, being a pronounced "original," Mr. Masfield is almost stiltedly the reverse under discipline.

Had he been less bemused by the high dignity of Racine in the story of Esther and Ahasuerus, and had he chosen rather to present the biblical story in a passionate and homelike version of his own, the result would have been worthier of commendation than anything in this volume.

More Jataka Tales.

The first volume of these tales, retold by Miss Babbitt from the translations of the original Sanskrit, which were made by the Guild of Jataka Translators, proved to be so popular as to suggest another volume. The new stories are in the same mood as the earlier ones and are supposed to refer to former incarnations of Buddha, the cleverest or most virtuous animal or person in each of the stories being a reincarnation of the Master, while the entire collection is regarded as sacred Buddhist lore. Despite its religious significance, which is only of curious interest to Western readers, these folk tales are as appropriate for young children as the juvenile versions of Aesop's fables, which they strongly resemble. They will also remind youngsters in their story interest of the Uncle Remus yarns. On the other hand, the philosophic depths of these Eastern fables, which are regarded as the oldest collection of folklore extant, and their classic simplicity will recommend them to adult readers. The new book, like its predecessor, is illustrated by the quaint silhouettes of Ellsworth Young.

Where Kipling Wrote "The Light That Failed."

Thirty years make few changes in a London street, and Villiers Street running down to the Thames past the smoke-smudged walls of Charing Cross Railway Station is much the same as when Rudyard Kipling lived in Number 19, the Embankment Chambers, and struggled for recognition from the London editors, says Arthur Bartlett Maurice in "Literary Pilgrimages" in the New York Herald. The third floor rooms in the Embankment Chambers where Kipling worked in his early twenties are the scene of nearly all the stories with a London background that he has written.

"For example, 'The Light That Failed.' The rooms shared by Torpenhow and Dick Helder were Kipling's own rooms. From the doorway of No. 19 poor Dick, stricken with blindness, groped down to the water's edge for the sense of the Thames' damp and the feel of the ships that wafted to his nostrils the pungent smells of the East. Lying across that doorway, Torpenhow first found Bessie Broke, the little street girl from 'south o' the river,' who fell in love with him, and revenged herself on Dick for his interference by scraping away the face of the Melancholia. On a table of the Kipling rooms in the Embankment Chambers, Charlie Mears, of 'The Finest Story in the World,' scrawled the words, meaningless to him, that told of the agony of the galley slave. The very table once had being. Kipling had been burning the midnight oil and generally overworking himself. On the table he had graved the words: 'Oft was I weary when I toiled at thee'—the motto which the galley slave carved upon his oar."

In one of the "Letters to Lithopolis," the de luxe, numbered edition of O. Henry's letters to Miss Mabel Wagnalls, which Doubleday, Page & Co. have just published, the storyteller sets down his autobiography thus: "Texas Cowboy. Lazy. Thought writing stories might be easier than 'busting' broncos. Came to New York one year ago to earn bread, butter, jam, and possibly asparagus that way. Last week loaned an editor $20. Please pardon the intrusion of finances, but I regard the transaction as an imperishable bay. Very few story writers have done that. Not many of them have the money. By the time they get it they know better."

Spring Valley will increase the height of Calaveras Dam and will build a conduit down Niles Canyon and to Irvington. The City will build the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit from Irvington to Crystal Springs.

The Company will pay to the City interest during construction on this latter work, and for the use of the Hetch Hetchy conduit, some $250,000 a year.

Thus a paramount San Francisco problem is being solved in an epoch-making way because those with whom its solution rests have placed the interests of their City above all other considerations.

"WILD BIRDS."

I have an idea that the experiment of the Greek Players in coming on this side to give a play in their repertoire was not financially successful; which would be more of a reproach to San Franciscans if they had employed more publicity.

What they came over to give was "Wild Birds," the prize play by Dan Totheroh, with which the young San Francisco playwright won the $300 prize in the play competition instituted by the Greek Theatre.

Mr. Totheroh's work is so meritorious that we San Franciscans may be rather proud of him, as the competition was open to all Californians. But we may hope, perhaps, too, that the visit of the Greek Players may be repeated on other occasions, as our acquaintanceship with their work we would not willingly permit to lapse. San Francisco is not so favorable an atmosphere to their line of work as Berkeley, and therefore it would depend on the hospitality of a comparatively limited number here; but that number should bestir themselves, on the occasion of any future visits, and not lose something really worth while.

"Wild Birds" is a tragedy founded on the ignorance and cruelty of human nature; for ignorance makes cruelty, where it does not already exist. It is a play eminently of its own time; this epoch in the phase of development of the drama in which gifted young men and women are playing an active part in pouring a bright illumination on those dusty, shadowy places in life which heretofore the dramatist and the fictionist have been chary of touching.

For the "Wild Birds" stand for youth at its springtime; the mating season when nature makes love spring involuntarily in young hearts.

In his "Wild Birds" Mr. Totheroh has depicted two young, actually innocent, pure-hearted adolescents on a lonely Middle West farm. They are waifs and strays; the girl an orphan working her way, the boy a refugee from a reform school whence horror had driven him to flight. Thus the two wild birds are trapped by a cruel hand, for the Slags are hard, even venomous taskmasters.

Mr. Totheroh's aim is to show the sort of ferocity of suspicion with which safely married folk, forgetting their own youth and its dumb yet normal yearnings for comradeship and love, view the inevitable veering together of the young and tender.

Mazie and Adam are little more than children; but she is seventeen when in her real loneliness the gentle, timid youth arrives and shares her labors. And the author has struck a vein of real pathos in his depiction of the character of Adam, who belongs to the pure in heart, but who, in the horror of his recollections of the reform school, believes because he has heard and seen and perhaps tentatively touched the pitch there that he has been hopelessly defiled.

The irresistible instinct which impels these two young creatures to grope blindly towards each other reminds one of Wedekind's "The Awakening." But Wedekind had no real tenderness toward humanity, and the author of this play is more gentle and pitiful toward his "wild birds."

His sternness—for the young author has the air of indicting humanity for its hypocritical attitude toward instinctive love at the mating age—is perhaps too extreme. Adam, who was really a humble Parsifal, sought to enshrine little Mazie in the sheltering niche of marriage. But the fierce, intolerable scorn of the Slags, and the savage eloquence of a stranger-preacher who dealt out fire and brimstone with truculent delight, are scarcely typical of the attitude of the world toward young lovers who would legitimately mate. It is in the later phases of the tragedy that we realize with sympathy that the world does sometimes regard as transgressors the sinless who are actually sinned against.

Mr. Totheroh has worked out his tragedy with a sort of stark simplicity. The two waifs are barefoot, the youth is ragged, and all the characters are in calico and jeans. Life is down to its primitive elements; a bare struggle for subsistence.

The dialogue is terse. No flowers of fancy grow in that prairie settlement except in the wistful hearts of the youthful pair. The adventitious aids to the gradual growth of the sad drama are effectively brought in; Corie's wedding, the coming of full springtime, the emotionally inciting fancies of crazy Sandy, another "wild bird," old, now, and doomed to ignorantly cruel long imprisonments in the farm buildings to restrain him from his aimless wanderings, but, during his occasional escapes, recalling to the simple pair his strange adventures in the fields and forests that the poor wretch had so loved.

"Wild Birds" will have to begin its career in "little theatres" in order to make its way. The managers of commercial theatres would shake in their shoes at the mere sight of it. But sometimes these plays built on fundamental human nature will insist on going forward. We must not forget that Eugene O'Neill—who, by the way, was one of the judges in the prize play contest—is at present one of the most eminent, if not the most eminent, of our young native dramatists. His plays were first heard in the little theatres, until by mere natural momentum they forced their way to Broadway, where three of them are now running simultaneously.

Although Mr. Totheroh's is a gentler muse, the O'Neill influence is evident in "Wild Birds." Not that the Californian has been imitating the New Yorker, but from Eugene O'Neill's success he has, in common with other young playwrights, gained the courage to be true to his conviction of what constitutes real drama.

It is fortunate for the Californian that he has so molded his drama as to allow the spectator to leave off with the emotion of pity maintaining its ascendancy over horror at Slag's cruelty; the reverse of Eugene O'Neill's later method, which seems to verge too much toward animosity for the theatre-goer in its determination to horrify and repel.

Mr. Totheroh is fortunate in having his play so well presented. One feels as if Violette Hunt will inevitably become a professional and rise to success, so instinctively correct is her technique, so sympathetic, so unerring is her depiction of guileless little Mazie. Not only is the young player, who is childlike in size and appearance, a perfect representation physically of what we may conceive Mazie to be, but she conveys the very essence of that youth, artless, tender being, just trembling on the verge of her womanhood's awakening.

Mr. Irving Pichel, also, fell in line with our conception of Adam, and poured into the reticent yet ardent love murmurings of the boy a strength of emotional appeal that made us feel to the full Adam's youth, his instinctive yearning, and his humble knightliness of soul.

But the play is well acted right through. Harold Luck gave a fine picture of Slag, the burly tyrant; and the rôles of the submissive, calicoed wife and daughter were excellently acted by Mary Babcock and Mary Morris. Elwyn Raffetto endowed Sandy with a bright-eyed craziness of aspect well in keeping with the character of a half-wit.

Edward Hogan's tramp had all that air of casual good-fellowship appropriate to the wandering hobo; and in their lesser rôles Albert Lee, Dorothy Luck, and Lloyd Carigan worked out the same singularly vivid identity with the characters assumed that had already surprised us in the more important ones, even the invisible revivalist conveying a strong sense of a truculently religious personality.

In fact, these Greek Players as a group show a surprisingly firm grasp on the technique of acting, from the principal rôles down. That they are as assured as professionals can not be said; as expert professionals, I mean, for they are much better than many professionals of good intention but poor execution that we have seen on the local stage.

But genuine enthusiasm tells. These people are in the grip of a real enthusiasm. There is nothing perfunctory in their work. Their imaginations function, which results in a stimulation of ours, and, as happens every now and then, this performance by amateurs was far more vivid and moving than it would have been played by the professional company of average merit.

At any rate, the play and the performance combined have left an exceedingly strong impression. Mr. Totheroh has made a few changes in his play, but his general plan is good. The tragedy is worked out progressively in a series of comparatively brief scenes, simple but effective settings for which have been supplied by the scenic artists of the Players Theatre.

"Wild Birds" does not induce a feeling of criticism, the only loose end, or, rather, slack thread, for the end was caught up in the last scene, being George Marshall's relations with Mazie. Whether or not he figured in the play merely in order to be the outside witness of the circumstances of Adam's death is uncertain, but his presence there was, from the point of play technique, advisable, as Slag was too conscienceless and cruel to be left at the final scene with only his own family and two eternally silent witnesses to know the truth.

NEGRO DRAMA.

Since the Ridgeley Torrance plays were acted in New York by a negro company, and Eugene O'Neill's "Emperor Jones" was played with Charles Gilpin, the negro actor, in the leading rôle, there has seemed to be a recognition by some Eastern managers that the negro has a place on the stage. Whether or not it is so, at least in so far as they can minister to the tastes of the whites, is not yet established. The colored race is exceedingly temperamental, and it seems as if, with proper teaching, dramatically gifted individuals of that race should shine in plays which truly express negro character.

This the Ridgeley Torrance plays do, but they seem to stand almost alone. And how rarely serious fiction, dramatic or otherwise, about negroes can hold the attention of the whites one realizes after reading T. S. Stribling's remarkable novel of negro life and character entitled "Birthright." This novel, which is just out, was written by a white resident of a Southern town presumably of the size and atmosphere of Hooker's Band in "Birthright." What is, to a Northerner, amazing and moving is the completeness and deep understanding with which Mr. Stribling interprets the darky character. Amazing is the success with which this sympathetic yet detached observer has penetrated under the dark skin and translated for us the farcical spirit, the futility, the helpless, hopeless aspiration, the tragedy of the race.

It seems on completing the book—which involuntarily one rereads immediately—as if "Birthright" can not fail in the future to stand as a classic, a manual, a prayer, to help in dealing with a great problem.

As a general thing it is not advisable to dramatize a novel. There is too much of the clashing psychology of the blacks and the whites to make "Birthright" transferable to the stage. But perhaps this novel will put into the mind of some equally gifted Southerner the idea of presenting in the drama the problem surrounding the pathetically lonely figure of the highly educated Southern negro.

Recently, indeed, there was a play of negro life and tendencies put upon the New York stage with Margaret Wycherly as the only white player. "Taboo," by Mary Hoyt Wiborg, is a dramatic presentation of the influence of voodoo on the mind and imagination of the Southern negro. The theme, however, is not treated realistically, but inclines toward the sensational and the spectacular.

The idea, however, of including voodoo in a dramatic survey on the negro character is a good one, being too important and essentially dramatic to overlook. It is difficult to estimate, from the conflicting reviews of Miss Wiborg's play, whether she has made real drama out of it. She used her theme as an illustration of the need for educating the colored race away from African superstition, and while not all of her reviewers were impressed by her treatment of it, some showed that imagination eagerly responded.

Robert Louis Stevenson, it will be remembered, had the voodoo motive serve in the West Indies tales of his "New Arabian Nights." George Cable also more than touched upon it in his once famous stories of negro slavery days, and of the necessary contacts of the two races, which so incensed the South.

I wonder, by the way, that the movie men, ever avid for new material, have never got their hooks into "The Grandissimes." It is a rather striking story, and full of pictures; real, yet dramatic; a reflection of life in a picturesque era; and the tragedy of the untamable African prince caught and mangled by the cruel slave machine is poignant and unforgettable.

PRODUCERS ARE COMING.

At last, it seems, San Francisco, the metropolis of the Pacific Coast—in spirit if not in fact—is to serve as a centre for theatrical production. Oliver Morosco is one of the most—and probably the most—enterprising of theatrical men whose career has been identified with California. Why he has hitherto located his producing theatre in Los Angeles, why he will now establish another in San Francisco, are probably business secrets. But at least it means something to San Francisco theatrically, more particularly if Mr. Morosco will occasionally present a play of really high standing. It might be done, although a producer is apt to run to one special style.

Mr. Morosco has specialized in musical and sentimental comedy, and his success in New York with the pieces he sent over there show that he is thorough in the line of work he undertakes. He won't put us off with poor, cheap apologies, either with plays or productions, and those—typical of the biggest, most numerous class of theatre-goers—who particularly affect the line of theatrical entertainment he will offer are jubilant.

Getano Merola, who is directing the musical festival to take place at the Stanford stadium, has also expressed—whether tentatively or not remains to be seen—some idea of starting here a stock operatic organization to which visiting stars will be invited to lend prestige.

Well, it is a long time since we've really been on the map, and with theatres going dark in London, Paris, and New York, we'll have to wait awhile yet; but, as times are not so hard out here as in the rest of the

THEATRICAL NOTES.

Shaw and Galsworthy.

Those two veteran dramatists, Shaw and Galsworthy, are still hard at it. In London they are running a cycle of the Galsworthy plays, and his new drama, "Loyalties," has made such an unqualified success that its transit to New York is inevitable.

"Loyalties" tells of the theft of a pocket-book containing £1000 value in notes made by a needy British officer who had distinguished himself in the war. He stole from a fellow-guest in a country house, and all the violated loyalties of tradition precipitated the subsequent tragedy.

Shaw has also had a cycle of plays produced, although in New York, the Theatre Guild having heroically tackled the strenuous job of producing by turns the several plays which make up "Back to Methuselah"; an alarming manifestation of Mr. Shaw's fecundity and prolixity in which, in a series of five separate dramas, he delves progressively back into the centuries.

In these plays Mr. Shaw's fertility of imagination and readiness in expression seem to have degenerated into a rather terrifying garb. The Theatre Guild plainly undertook to do for their favorite prophet what no other theatre, perhaps, would have tackled. His cleverness was evident, he was comic, inventive, ingenious, but interminable—his great fault.

The Shaw sense of humor was all there, but impaired by prolixity. Plainly, brilliant as was the work of the Guild in presenting this hippopotamatic drama, it was something to take in homeopathic doses. There were long expositions on art, science, literature, pathology, medicine, politics, sociology, and other abstractions, the plays, in fact, seeming to be a series of conversaciones; Shaw at his Shawest.

Apparently the hand of G. B. is losing its cunning, or else—confounding thought—he is busily engaged in making hay while the sun of public favor continues to shine.

Duse Re-appears.

Eleanora Duse is probably the greatest living player, but even she failed to win the public from which she had been so long secluded to tolerate a play that had an unhappy ending. "So Be It"—a peasant woman's resigned acceptance of the final crushing blow that fate had in store for her—is a play by a gifted young Italian dramatist, in which is depicted the fidelity with which a mother kept her vow to God by making a lifelong pilgrimage in gratitude that her prayers for saving the life of her sick child were granted.

The drama was brought out in Rome, Eleanora Duse acting the rôle of the mother. But when in the final act the mother, after long years, reveals herself to her grown son, only to be received with suspicion and coarse abuse, the audience hissed and cat-called so vehemently that Duse decided to drop the play from her repertoire.

It is curious that this greatly admired actress, emerging from her long retirement, after having previously made the strong-stomached Italian public accept D'Annunzio's morbid plays, should be so treated when presenting a serious one that was a reflection of life. But the incident forms another instance of the incalculable and undependable fancies of the public.

Co-operative Companies.

The hard times that have driven many professional players to other occupations have also stimulated them to coöperative enterprise. So far New York attempts have resulted in nothing lasting, but in February the Players' Assembly, a group of players favorably known in the metropolis, organized and made a very systematic, well-conducted, businesslike start with the Parisian success, "Montmartre," for a vehicle. In April it is still running, which is pretty significant. Evidently they made it go.

In London the unemployed actors, alarmed at their inability to obtain the usual employment, got together, and, using the Actors' Fund for a financial backing, evolved a plan for running a theatre whereby the players would receive a small salary and a proportionate share of what remained after expenses were paid.

About the same time news came that the young dramatists in Paris who could not sell their wares organized an association of players in order to bring their work before the public and earn the withheld wherewithal.

All of which proves that when the wolf growls too alarmingly even artists will make a desperate attempt to be practical and businesslike.

They Have Brieux.

The movie man, rummaging among Brieux' old plays, has dug out "The Cradle" and revised it for American consumption. "The Cradle" is the profitable title, the central idea being similarly profitable.

A divorced couple meet at the bedside of their sick child, the mother there realizing that she must renounce her second marriage and devote herself to her child, pledge of a legitimate love. Thus, as her first husband is remarried, she remains alone by "the cradle."

The theme has also been approximately treated in another French drama, Paul Hervieu's "Le Dédale," and, whatever may be the tendencies toward divorce in American life, American movie fans will be sure to take kindly to it, so the indications are that Brieux is in for fat pickings.

The Columbia Theatre.

Henry Miller has brought to San Francisco the finest dramatic organization in years, and all preparations have been made for the première of the new comedy, "Her Friend the King," announced for Monday night, May 1st, at the Columbia Theatre. In the cast will appear Henry Miller and Blanche Bates. Later on another new play will call for the appearance of Mr. Miller, Miss Bates, Miss Chatterton, Mr. McRae, and others of the organization.

Mr. Miller is held in high esteem in this city, and his organization can boast of being a distinguished organization. With him are Blanche Bates, Ruth Chatterton, Bruce McRae, Geoffrey Kerr, Marguerite St. John, A. G. Andrews, Annette Westbay, Paul Harvey, Bert Leigh, Elmer Brown, and George Hadson.

"Her Friend the King" is by A. E. Thomas and Harrison Rhodes, from the book "High Life," by Mr. Rhodes. The play is for acts, all of which are laid in Switzerland, and Mr. Miller has prepared a production of completeness and detail. Matinees are announced for Wednesday and Saturday.

The Orpheum Next Week.

David Schooler has just staged what he terms "Music Hath Charms," an allegory. It tells in prose, verse, and music of the origin of music, melody, rhythm, harmony and technique. Four clever girls are required in addition to Mr. Schooler. Mareta Nally is Mr. Schooler's principal support and the trio of other assistants are Ellen Boyle, Ina Alcova, and Peggy Vane. Miss Nally is an all-around assistant. Misses Boyle and Vane are song-birds and Ina Alcova is a toe dancer. "Music Hath Charms" was written and staged by Dave Schooler and Herman Timberg.

The American tenor is no longer a mere hope. Not the least among the American artists who have helped to rid the musical world of this impression is Allan Rogers, a young American singer of vocal superiority there is not the slightest doubt. Mr. Rogers has already acquired an enviable position in musical circles. Musical critics, however, declare that there is no height so high that he can't scale if he tries. Mr. Rogers in his work and his ascending travels hand in hand with his wife, Leonora Allen, a young woman with a soprano of charm.

Requisitioning the services of E. L. Rice, the foremost minstrel and theatrical authority, and James Madison, famous vaudeville author, Howard J. Greer and Milton Hackey, vaudeville producers, asked if it was possible to get three real comedians of different methods and a singer that could really sing a ballad and have them all over sixty years of age. Mr. Rice was staggered momentarily. However, he went after it and succeeded in assembling a quartet consisting of John Gorman, of the famous Gorman Brothers; Charley Udell, of Udell and Pearce; Billy Golden, of "Turkey in the Straw" international fame, and Charley Whyte, who sang with Colonel Jack Haverly's Minstrels when singing had to be good. In conjunction with the above list of "old timers" the promoters secured the services of Billy Tate, a juvenile, for interlocutor. It is an offering of "Auld Lang Syne" that will rejuvenate the old and delight the young.

James Doyle and Evelyn Cavanaugh are offering a unique skit called "In the Lobby."

Dezso Retter, an acrobatic comedian, internationally famous as "The Man Who Wrestles with Himself," appears in an offering called "The Gym King," consisting of a superior brand of comedy acrobatic stunts that are novel and original.

Jimmy Lucas with his "Vampires and Fools," Fenton and Fields in their excellent comedy, and Peggy Parker with her "Four Musketeers" remain for a second week.

At La Gaité Française they are giving "Pour Avoir Adrienne," which ran for nearly two years in Paris. They will play it on Friday and Saturday nights of this week, and on five or six dates in May.

The Lund Recital.

The Alice Seckels Salon Series, to be given at the Hotel Del Monte, which will consist of a set of programmes carefully selected to hit off the tastes of the guests, will be inaugurated on the evening of April 27th. Mrs. Henry Lund, Jr., will, on this occasion, give a recital of character sketches and impersonations, which will include some of the new material acquired during her winter in New York. Among her impersonations of noted actresses will be included those of Gilda Varesi of "Enter Madame" fame and of Ethel Barrymore.

VANITY FAIR.

Certain influential sections of the British press are taking quite seriously, as well they may, the shortage of servants in England and its coincidence with the shortage of money among the aristocracy. They painfully remark the consequent necessity for many ladies to do their own housework, and for some even to go out to service. When English ladies do go out to service, they make pathetic efforts to do so anonymously, and in subtle ways to preserve the caste distinctions which have constituted so important a part of their social responsibilities for generations. As useful rather than merely graceful or ornamental persons, they have been discovering in themselves a sad lack of mastery of any practical kitchen arts, and are beginning in numbers to attend public cooking schools, never having had mothers that could teach them how to brown the sparrows, roll the biscuits, or extract the ambrosial savors from a good soup bone. As to buckwheats and "N'Orleans" on a snappy morning, of course that is totally beyond them, and will probably remain so; but there are things that English ladies might learn about cooking, many thousand things we should say, provided they could find anybody in England capable of teaching them. In a country where it is the general custom to have tea for breakfast, it does not seem likely that any very useful knowledge of the art of cookery will ever be acquired, but the ladies are going right at it, and perhaps determination will win.

Much social mystery, heretofore, has been made of this departure. Duchesses, as part of the newly poor, do not advertise what they are doing. It would shock British society to its foundations—perhaps rock it off its foundations. One might as well announce herself a convert to Malthusianism and go in for teaching the doctrine of birth control. Only the cooking-school instructors know the identity of some of their aristocratic pupils, and their business depends on keeping it dark. Many of these pupils have never before set foot in a kitchen, and whatever the outcome of the Genoa Conference, we may expect a great deal of indigestion in England for the next twenty-five years. The movement has been gaining headway, however, toward a position where secrecy may no longer be required, inasmuch as cooking is being directly patronized by some members of the elite. It is said that the Countess of Falmouth is now competent to boil eggs, and that Lady Henry Murray and Lady Chichester are "equal to" producing some of that lukewarm, vulcanized bread which accompanies English tea under the alias of toast. A London editor, foreseeing more trouble for the empire, ironically asks: "Would it not be better instead of making cooks out of the nobility to raise cooks into the nobility?" It is a noble suggestion. Undoubtedly it would be better—and safer. But things can not always be as they should. An English king (he must have been very drunk at the time) once knighted a roast of beef, so that we have had to eat that particular cut under the name of Sir Loin ever since, and certainly there are cooks that should be honored in some such way. But as a rule they are not English cooks. However the question shall be settled, let the duchesses go right on. They can not make English cookery any worse than it is.

Ude, who cooked at Crockford's Club during the Regency, and who had been chef to Louis XIV, to Lord Sefton, and to the Duke of York in turn, declared that while music, dancing, fencing, painting and mechanics had professors under twenty years of age, excellence in cookery was never obtained under thirty. He left Lord Sefton flat because a guest put more pepper in his soup. There was a cook! But he was not English. In England was it said that God sends meat, the devil sends cooks.

A London dispatch of April 20th says: "The ocean failed to knock out Jack Dempsey, but English food put him out in the first round, as it has other trustful tourists. The champion kept close to his room most of the day following a dinner last night with the Dolly sisters. Manager Kearns admitted Jack was taking a recuperative rest, but otherwise the champion was in good shape."

In addition to Margot Asquith, Gibby Chesterton, W. L. George and their ilk, Muriel Harris of the Manchester Guardian has been giving us the up-and-down, and finds that our boys and girls are apt to marry young. She thinks this needs explaining, and proceeds:

"The whole question is, of course, largely economic. In the older countries it is the extremes—the very well off or the very poor—who marry early. The middle class has to wait for the possibility of an income. In America it is, comparatively, easier to earn an adequate income when you are very young than when you are older. American sentiment, again, is all with youth. For one thing, it likes a gamble, and you can gamble on the capacities of a young man, whereas you know definitely the limitations of the older man. Again, American life actually demands the youthful qualities of energy and enthusiasm and daring. Americans choose their young business men for very much the same qualities as the Air Board used to choose its aviators. Quite possibly the young man may continue at this high pitch later on; if not, he drops steadily behind and, in his turn, is superseded by youth again. This desire for youth on the part of the business man makes the pay of the young middle-class man comparatively high. At twenty-two or three he may easily be keeping a house of his own, a wife, and a motor. It implies also that he begins his business career very early, and that academic education in his case is somewhat at a discount.

"Besides earning a good deal of money very early, the American middle-class youth does not face the same risks as does the man of the older countries. There is no special virtue, for instance, in sticking to a job. Rather does it prove that you have not been able to make an opportunity to move on. The loss of a job, therefore, has nothing catastrophic about it. If you are tired of your bank, you turn to the advertisement department of a theatrical magazine. If this fails you, you can probably make a good income by selling patent toasters on commission to the big hotels. There are an enormous number of openings of the 'salesman' or commercial traveler kind for which there is no equivalent in Europe.

"As far as the girl is concerned, the American girl is brought up to marry almost in the Victorian sense. There is no question of her not being able to marry, and if she elects to remain single it is not, generally, from lack of opportunity. While there is a more serious movement now in the direction of higher education, it is not as yet at all comparable with higher education for girls in Europe. Accomplishments are still made a point of in the real Victorian sense. A girl must sing a little or play a little, and not very much is demanded of her in the way of thoroughness. Similarly she must dance beautifully, and must have exactly the right deportment or perish. Dress is a very important item from earliest childhood almost. Little American girls must have little American 'beaux' as a point of honor. A little girl of twelve told me in all seriousness that at parties you must never look as though you couldn't get a partner. Far better dance with a girl and tell the boys that you prefer it! The American girl, again, is remarkably domesticated from earliest youth. In the absence of nurseries, she is about with her mother or with the cook when she is not at school, and she learns cooking and housework and marketing almost as she goes along.

This domesticity is a trait of American girls, whether rich or poor. They are excellent needlewomen, and, in the absence of domestic service and of the genus 'little dressmaker,' they show extraordinary adaptability and cleverness in making up for the deficiency by their own work. Thus both boys and girls have a certain precocity in early youth, which culminates in the early marriage.

"The results of the early marriage differ a good deal. It means that the children have the advantage of young parents and that there is not the gap to be bridged between the generations which is the result of older marriages. American children are said to be spoilt, and in a sense this is true. In another sense, however, it is that there is a sort of camaraderie between parents and children, a kind of equality which prevents the absolute dictation of the one to the other. Ultimately this makes for very close ties between the two generations. Their interests, for one thing, are really so very similar. And just as the parents spoil the children, so the children later on are very much inclined to spoil the parents. The apparent lack of influence of the parents upon the children in early youth seems balanced by the very great influence wielded by the parents later on. Another result is the number of extremely youthful grandparents who abound in America. In some ways they strike one as being a little attenuated by having had all their important experiences so young. There has not been very much time, for instance, for making a background of culture and interests which shall serve them in good stead later on. In some ways they almost correspond to the spinster of the Old World, with the important difference that they have always the supreme interest of their children and grandchildren, and that they are young enough to share closely in their interests and doings. The early marriage, indeed, breaks down the barriers of the generations very much as the needs of the country make American class distinctions a very fluid quantity. It is, moreover, supremely natural—as were the youthful marriages of the great war—and the logical outcome of American needs and conditions of life."

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Ingram Bywater, the English wit, who was incidentally a great smoker, used to repeat a repartee of Pope Pius IX to Cardinal Antonelli. Pio Nono, conversing with the Cardinal, lit a cigarette and handed his case to the Cardinal, who said austere, "You know, Holiness, that I have not that vice." "You know, Eminence," replied the Pope, "that if it were a vice, you would have it."

In a downtown building several people were waiting for the elevator. The car was crowded when a lady stepping in attempted to pull friend husband along. The alert operator called, "Just one more, that is all," and pushed the gentleman back. "So you want to separate us," said the lady. "Yes," was the answer; "I would rather separate you this way than the other way."

George Moore, the English novelist, and a group of other literati were discussing recent books. Mr. Moore wished to refer to the author of a new publication, but could not recall his name. "You know," said Moore, "the man with the funny name. Dear, dear, what is it? You know, a stupid name, a silly name." "Shaw?" suggested some one. "That's it," said Moore. "Shaw! What an extraordinary name!"

Lord Angus Kennedy tells the story of how once, while on a walking tour in a remote part of the Scottish Highlands, he came to a lonely inn. Being ravenously hungry, he entered, and asked the landlady for some poached eggs, as being the most likely dish to be provided at so short notice. The landlady shook her head. "We haven't any eggs, sir," she said. "But," lowering her voice to a whisper, "I dinna doot that I could get you a fine dish of poached salmon."

Mr. G. B. Burgin, who has written over sixty novels and has just produced his second book of personal memoirs, tells of a popular novelist of whom the public wearied. He retired to the country to grow apples, and then he wrote his best book. At his wife's suggestion he sent it to a publisher under another name. The book was a great success. The author wrote other successes and the secret has been kept to this day, while the public marvels at the wisdom of the "young author."

According to Representative Volstead, all drinkers are moderate drinkers in their own estimation. "What man ever admits to drinking immoderately?" asks the author of the dry enforcement law. "The moderate drinker, so called, reminds me of the moderate smoker, who said: 'Yes, I've cut my smoking down almost to nil. I only smoke now before breakfast, after lunch and dinner and between meals. I've altogether abandoned my habit of getting up in the night to smoke.'"

The curate was admonishing the village sport. "You ought not to spend all your wages, George." George indignantly retorted that he did not. "No?" queried the curate suspiciously. "No, sir," said George. "I make it a rule never to spend more'n two-thirds of my wages on no account whatever." "Well, well," said the curate pleasantly, "you put the rest in the bank, I suppose?" "No," said George, "I put it to a better use 'n that, sir. I give it to the wife to keep house on."

A Southern revival meeting was in progress. The parson was in an ecstatic state of reform. "Bruders and sistahs, I wants to warn you against de heinous crime ob shooting craps and fuddermo' I wants to warn you 'bout de heinous crime ob stealing wata-melons." At this juncture, a dandy in the back of the tent rose up, snapped his fingers, and sat down again. "Wharfo', brudder, does yo' rise up and snap yo' fingahs at my abjurations." "You jes' reminds me, pahson, whar all I lef' ma jackknife," was the penitent response.

Senator Lodge was holding forth about small nations. A little nation that had been put in its place by the Allies was under discussion and the representative from Massachusetts held that nations, like individuals, occasionally stood in need of reproof. "The Allies conducted themselves very nicely, I think. They were like the beautiful girl to whom a bald-headed and poverty-stricken bachelor had the effrontery to propose. 'Let's get married,' the bachelor said, grabbing the girl's hand. 'But who'd have us?' she laughed."

With a sentimental leaning toward the days of his own youth, a certain business man sent his son to the college where he had himself been educated. On arriving at the place of much knowledge the young man began to make a few inquiries. "I should like to see my father's record," said he to the head of the college. "He was here in 1890." "I shall be very pleased to show you the record," was the reply. "But have you any special reason for consulting it?" "Well," replied the youth frankly, "when I left home dad told me not to disgrace his record, and I only want to see how far I can go."

In the early days there was a railroad in Tennessee which allowed its conductors to make their own rules affecting the traveling public. Sometimes one conductor had rules in direct conflict with the other. One of the conductors would permit passengers to take their dogs into the coaches with them. The conductor running opposite would not allow a dog on his train, not even in the baggage car. One day some hunters, returning to the city, met the conductor who would not allow a dog to ride on his train. When the train left the station the dog followed tied to the train, and had no difficulty in keeping up with it. When the conductor saw what was happening he was highly incensed over the disrespect shown to his train. "Watch your old dog when we start down grade," he stormed, "and see what happens to him. You think you are making fun of my train." A little later, when on the down grade, the conductor approached the rear platform, and not seeing the dog, called to the owner: "Now tell me, please, what has become of your dog." "Right here," retorted the passenger, pointing to a big hole in the floor of the coach, "see him under there? He just came under the coach to trot along in the shade."

THE MERRY MUSE.

Ode to Spring—and All That

Er—Spring!

You perfectly priceless old thing!
I'm frightfully bucked at the signs that one sees;
The jolly old sap in the topping old trees;
The priceless old lilac, and that sort of rot;
It jolly well cheers a chap up, does it not?
It's so fearfully bright;
So amazingly right.
And one feels as one feels if one got rather tight.
There's a tang in the air,
If you know what I mean,
And the grass, as it were,
Is so frightfully green.
We shall soon have the jolly old bee on the wing—
Er—Spring.

Old fruit!

You've given old Winter the boot.
The voice of the tailor is heard in the land
(I wonder what my rotten credit will stand?),
And the birds and the flow'rs (but especially the "birds")

Will be looking too perfectly priceless for words.
We shall have to get stocks
Of new ties and new socks,
And of course we must alter the jolly old clocks;
So a young fellow's fancy
Turns nat'rally towards
The river and Nancie,
Or Betty and Lord's.
In fact—as I said—you're a priceless old thing—
Er—Spring.

Old bean!

It's—well, it's—you know what I mean.
It's time I was oiling the jolly old bat,
So, cutting a long story short, and all that,
The theme of this jolly old song that I sing
Is—er—jolly old Spring!

—Desmond Carter in London Opinion.

Keeping Their Tags.

The holder of Britain's newest earldom—the former Arthur James Balfour—emulates well-established precedent in taking a title inclusive of his own name, says the Philadelphia Public Ledger. Sir Edward Grey became Viscount Grey of Falloden; Mr. Haldane, the well-known Liberal statesman, chose to be known as Viscount Haldane of Cloan; John Morley christened himself, as a peer, Viscount Morley of Blackburn, and Waldorf husband of Lady Astor, inherited the title of his father, who elected to be called Viscount Astor of Hever Castle.

Not all commoners elevated to the British peerage cling to their ancestral names. Lord Northcliffe (formerly Alfred Harmsworth) named himself after the North Cliff of England, near which his first country home at Broadstairs stands. The Earl of Reading (formerly Rufus Isaacs) took that title because he had for so many years represented the city of Reading in Parliament.

An opposition newspaper once suggested to a certain renowned Englishman, upon his achievement of a peerage, that he take the title of "Lord Help Us."

The inhabitants of the district of the port of New York devour, waste, spoil, and otherwise destroy 8,445,200,000 pounds of food every year. Sometimes it doesn't seem worth it.

"Flubdub says he doesn't know what whisky tastes like." "Must be one of these fellers that started drinking after the passing of the Volstead Act."—Judge.

How We Overcame
the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

Cycol will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

A Peculiar People.

The eccentricities of the Doukhobors, that strange Russian sect of super-conscientious objectors, have attracted world-wide notice from time to time ever since they first presented, in the middle of the last century, an awkward problem which successive Czars attempted to meet by harrying them from one home to another in Russia, says the Manchester Guardian. The British Empire acquired a special and paternal interest in them in the 'nineties, for it was then that a staunch fight against conscription, followed by persecution, stimulated the orthodox among them to a kind of revival. Ignoring the backsliders who had been absorbed in the normal life of Russia, a majority of the Doukhobors at that time revived their ancient faith in all its curious details. They divided up their property, renounced tobacco, wine, and meat, and reiterated their vows against every kind of excess and against being parties to any sort of violence. The result was intensified persecution, from which many died. Tolstoy enlisted the sympathy of the Friends in England, who helped both with means and with a petition to the Czar that such uncomfortable subjects should be allowed to leave his realm. Thus it was that the Doukhobors, some 8000 strong, reached Canada, where they have proved themselves excellent, if eccentric, citizens. They established a useful brickmaking plant at Yorktown in 1907, and though small parties have constantly broken away to lead a nomadic life, the Canadian government has more than once paid tribute to their gentle, law-abiding nature. The ranks of the vagrant Doukhobors were reinforced in 1919, when a number of them voluntarily surrendered lands they had acquired, in favor of returned soldiers, and pushed westward. From the leader of these Western wanderers there now comes an ultimatum that is interesting to Canada. His people find the burden of taxation so heavy that, according to the Winnipeg Free Press, they propose to lighten their load by throwing their infants and infirm people into the Columbia River. Eccentricity must have its limits in any well-ordered state, and we do not doubt that the Western Doukhobor chief, Peter Veregin, knows this.

Either he has been reading Swift, and thinks an imitation of the "Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Ireland from Being a Burden to Their Parents and Country," by polishing them off, is good propaganda, or he has, without this inspiration, arrived at the same stroke of sarcasm. His threat will probably not be taken more seriously by the Canadian authorities than would a similar ultimatum from, say, the Plymouth Brethren by the British government. But it is certainly an effective way of calling attention to the privations that come of heavy taxation, as well as to the difficulties and obligations that attach to accepting as citizens so peculiar a people.

PORTOLA WOODS

A Spring Valley Subdivision

In the desirable Woodside district of San Mateo County is the country-home acreage known as Portola Woods. It adjoins the Family Farm and the properties of Stanford University, being situated less than five miles from the University buildings.

Here are thickets and open spaces, hills and hollows, with a wealth of oaks, redwoods and other trees, the whole so subdivided as to give each parcel the charm of scenic variety.

Bear Gulch Creek flows through the property to join San Francisco Creek.

Water is piped to every lot, the roads are good, there are here combined the advantages of rustic seclusion and accessibility.

Home-sites vary in size from 8 to 39 acres. For the parcels that remain unsold prices per acre range from $450 to $650—lower than prevailing prices for similar property in that region. These prices are particularly attractive compared with prices of city lots.

The high-class improvements on the parcels already sold stamp the countryside so unmistakably that this subdivision can not fail to appeal to the most discriminating seeker after the ideal country-home site.

Full information and maps may be had from T. J. Wilder, Real Estate Department, Spring Valley Water Company, 375 Sutter Street, San Francisco. Douglas 2562.

Saving an Art Treasure.

The Column of Progress on San Francisco's Marina is the finest object of its sort in the modern world, and few things in the ancient world surpassed it in beauty and æsthetic effect. No other city possesses such a distinction. By comparison, Trajan's Column, which suggested it, is a somewhat primitive forerunner, whose composition and artistic values have been improved by the modern artists, exactly as the automobile of today is a better thing than the automobile of twenty years ago. By comparison again, the Vendôme Column in Paris, which our column recalls, is lacking in beauty and inspiration. The San Francisco column is surmounted by one of the most dramatic plastic groups in the whole range of modern sculpture: Hermon A. MacNeil's "Adventurous Bowman," a bold and daring conception, expressing vividly the aspirations of the race and its determination to advance. Standing in full view of all the shipping that enters the harbor, there is nothing else conceivable that could so embody and convey the spirit of San Francisco; and its conception by the architects of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition was nothing short of an inspiration. Fortunately the core of the column had to be constructed of a strong material. It is a sound, elastic steel frame, fit to withstand, if properly protected, the storms of years to come. But owing to the necessarily temporary nature of most exposition construction, the protection is rapidly weathering away, and the column itself has become in external aspect a rather pathetic ruin. It is said that it would be neither difficult nor very expensive to restore the outer casing, coating it with hard material that would secure us this beautiful object in comparative permanence. We can imagine no more civilized use that could be made of a few thousand dollars than to preserve this unique, beautiful, and stimulating thing, to enrich the life of the city for unnumbered generations to come. Only, if restoration of the envelope is to be attempted it must be done with reverence for the work of the sculptors that contributed to its beauty. No policeman must be permitted to censor it, no mechanic to hide or discard its more delicate features, such as the exquisite suggestion of ships and voyages in the low relief of the helical band about it. Its great base should be preserved, with its tablets to the flying men, and Isidor Konti's bas-reliefs of struggling humanity. Above all, the "Adventurous Bowman" group should be retained exactly as it is, with the wonderful pedestal on which it stands. Those who will put their hands to this work and see it through with fidelity to the original form will do a great service to their city and deserve the name of patriot.

Child Welfare Week.

The week of May 8th to 13th is Children's Week—not a period of sentimental observance, as Be Good to Animals Week, or Raisin Day, but a week set aside by the Child Welfare Division of the Department of Public Health to weigh and measure all children about to enter the public schools. Children of five and six are being registered this week for weighing even as their elders are being registered for voting; and the occasion is an equally important civic one.

At first blush, the child's weight may not seem of great significance. There are many platitudes about the subject—perhaps the silliest being that a healthy child has a fund of heaven-sent vitality that nothing can diminish. Scientific research now seems to indicate that nutrition is more important in childhood than at any other time—though it is always of paramount importance to general health—and that weight is an index to it.

Some time ago the San Francisco Tuberculosis Association carried out an experiment relative to the weight of school children. It is an accepted medical fact that children of a certain age and of certain measurements should have a corresponding weight. The Tuberculosis Association may not have been surprised at the result of their experiment, but San Francisco school authorities were. The interesting fact is that a comparison of school reports on the measuring and weighing done by the association showed that children of the superior neighborhoods, such as, for example, that of the Madison School, were under weight compared to youngsters from the poorer, foreign districts. Similar experiments carried out elsewhere yielded similar results. Dr. Royal Copeland's investigations in New York showed that the poor of the East Side have relatively healthier young than the best-nurtured children from the Riverside Drive or Fifth Avenue districts.

This does not mean that the slums are conducive to health or that the progeny of our foreign-born element is natively healthier than the young of American stock. It does mean that there is a fundamental difference in the living conditions of the children from the two extremes of society and that, strange to say, the odds are in favor of the poorer classes. It means that, contrary to one's preconceived notions, money does not buy health. And it means, above all, that health is founded on nutrition and exercise, and that unfortunately the children of the prosperous, despite better sanitary conditions and better medical treatment, do not eat the simple, nutritious foods on which the poor, by force of evolution and self-preservation, largely subsist. With reference to this subject Dr. A. A. D'Ancona said that he would rather a child did not brush his teeth, essential as that is, than that he should not have simple, nutritious food.

The youngster of the upper middle-class family is probably allowed too much pocket money. He eats too many ice-cream sundaes and too many chocolates. He is kept up late for special, though too frequent, occasions, and does not get the outdoor exercise that his colleague in the poorer district enjoys of necessity. The slum youngster has no attractive nursery to keep him indoors. All of these are factors. It is, of course, an indubitable fact that owing to extreme poverty many children are underfed. The astonishing thing is that children of the upper classes should be underfed—which is what their under-weight condition implies.

The Tariff in the Senate.

It is inevitable that the tariff, affecting producer and consumer alike, should become a large part of our industrial constitution, and so whenever that particular home brew is brewing the whole American family becomes interested in the product, and stands about wondering how it will taste and what result it is going to have upon the human system. According to the recent discussions in the Senate over the Senate Finance Committee's report, we are now about to receive, to switch the figure, an elastic tariff, one that will stretch with the national footsteps like the side of an old-fashioned gaiter shoe. The rubber is to be supplied by the President, whose delight it will be to make the thing expand and contract with the changing tensions of trade, because the authors of the bill in its present form frankly admit that such a wizard performance is beyond the miracle-working powers of Congress. That is going to make the President a very busy man if he tries to attend to it himself; he will learn sympathy for the proverbial one-armed paper-hanger with the hives. After attempting a few adjustments he will probably turn the job over to the Tariff Commission. Then, with railway rates regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, customs by the Tariff Commission, other phases of trade by the Federal Trade Commission, the length of skirts by a Skirt Commission, the number of stripes in a shirt by a Shirt Commission, and a few other commissions to attend to anything left over, with a Residuary Regulating Commission to regulate anything that may have been forgotten, and a good, high tariff on peanuts, we should take our place in the sun as the best regulated, best protected little nation on earth.

The Senate Finance Committee has labored long and hard over the rather raw material sent up by the House in the form of the Fordney bill, and has brought forth a tremendous piece of work, which the country at large will be a long time learning to understand. This much can be said for the laborers in this stony vineyard—that in the whole history of tariff legislation there probably has never been a time when international trade was so chaotic and the framing of a tariff law so beset with difficulty. It has necessitated an effort to meet the unexpected contingency, for in commerce today the unexpected contingency is the only thing that we can expect to meet. Manufacturers have asked for high tariff rates more because of what they feared than what they were experiencing. They know that certain Europeans are desperate, and they see all sorts of what they call unfair competition ahead. Certain industries brought forth and nourished by the war are threatened with early death unless artificial feeding is resorted to, and in the Senate chamber the question has arisen whether it would not be better to let these ill-begotten infants perish. Such does not seem to be the attitude of the framers of the bill, it must be said, and every effort is to be made to preserve what we have received in that form. Bravely Senator Smoot and his colleagues are defending the schedules and the administrative features against a certain carping opposition led largely by Senator Jones of New Mexico, who persists in offering embarrassing reminders of consumers; a troublesome and, withal, an ungrateful race, without organization, whose vote is easily split by other issues.

Some features that come to the front at the present stage of development are the change from the American valuation to the foreign valuation plan, the transference to the President of a large field of activity that has a strong resemblance to legislative action and hence verges on the unconstitutional, and the definite abandonment of the old principle of reciprocity so dear to the hearts of James G. Blaine and his followers. On this last head Senator Smoot in debate the other day called attention to the fact that though the House bill attempted to apply the principle of reciprocity treaties, such arrangements negotiated in the past have yielded but meagre results, and only one of them (with Cuba) remains in force. Instead of this discriminative invention it is now proposed that the basis of our commercial relations shall be equal treatment to all and from all, without any more special bargains and treaties. It will be interesting to observe whether this idea can be carried through to the ultimate passage of the bill.

As to American valuation, it appears to have been found more complicated than foreign, even considering the Bedlamite effects of violently fluctuant exchange and debased European currency. It was not feasible to build it on the value of American products comparable and competitive with the imported article, because there are really few imported articles that have their exact counterparts in domestic manufacture. As to the wholesale selling price of the imported article in the United States, that depended on a great many variants, one of which was the tariff itself; in order to know what the tariff was to be you had to know what the selling price was to be, but in order to know what the selling price was to be you had to know what the tariff was to be; and there you were. Ole's second yump for the departed ferryboat had a solid take-off by comparison.

And right here the Senate committee goes through a manœuvre that might be designated a justifiable passing of the buck. It knows that there are Europeans so degraded in their instincts that in order to get trade they will descend to the nethermost depths of iniquity and offer to sell goods to Americans cheaper than Americans will. These villainies the committee feels must be repelled. But no tariff it can exact, based on foreign valuation, will be sufficient to repel them all, and so, although it admits the practical impossibility of founding anything definite on American valuation, it hands along to the President the duty of repelling dumping by tariffs formed just that way, and going to the extent of 50 per cent. of the value. This puts the President in the position of the mountain congressional candidate who told his audience: "The feller on the other ticket is gittin' this here tariff business all complicated up fer nothin'. Hit aint as bad as all that. If I'm elected an' I find the tariff is too high I'll lower it, an' if I find it's too low I'll hist it." He, was elected. In case of dumping, that is all the President will have to do.

It is believed by the committee, and where so much is in doubt belief is all that can be expected, that basing the schedules on the wholesale price of the imported article in the country of origin will result in duties lower than the House bill provided. Even so, these will be, if they are adopted, the highest duties under which we have ever tried to live, and with the anti-dumping, sliding scale weapons put into the hands of the President, it is felt that a full measure of protection has been provided for the American manufacturer. But the tariff bill has a long way to go. Times have been changing. We have become for the first time in our history the great creditor nation. Trade there must be, in the interest of world reconstruction, and of settlement of Europe's debts to us. The President has seen this, and issued a warning against "making our tariffs prohibitive"; and the Senate committee itself feels that cases may arise under which rates will prove too high and the consumer will be entitled to a reduction. The bill has lost the support of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and is even in danger of being attacked by it. The administrative features at least seem good, if not the schedules themselves. But if one of these Siamese twins is killed the other will probably die with it.

Recognition.

Outside of North Dakota, and still, to a great extent, within the boundaries of that distracted state, this is a capitalistic country. Lenin and Trotzky have not only admitted it, they have cursed us with the accusation of it. They are right. It is. It is also a country of free labor and it has progressed on that basis because there is no other way to progress; and it will be a fool, and its people will acquire appetites out of all proportion to the food in sight, if it ever tries the Lenin and Trotzky method. This does not mean that capitalists are all-wise and all-good and must have their way all the time. In detail there is no particular capitalistic way of doing things, because not all the owners of factories and mines, and employers of labor, pursue the same method. But it does mean that we have a fair amount of personal liberty left from the bureaucrats and other meddlers, that life and property are reasonably safe after the tax collectors and the highwaymen are through with us, that we have every religion ever revealed, that our workmen have a right to strike whenever they please to, but not to drive spikes in other people's saw-logs, and that they exercise their right a good deal more often than does their any good; that we still think a man that makes a contract ought to keep it or pay damages, that a private individual or a corporation can still own machinery and hire other men to operate it on terms mutually agreeable, and that as a nation we feel that people should at least aspire to what is known as common honesty; in none of which things do statesmen of the Lenin and Trotzky type appear to believe.

Yet they clamor to be "recognized" by the government of the United States. They have robbed a great class of Russian society of its goods and thousands of its lives, and they propose to trade with other people by means of the gold and jewels they have filched from their unfortunate countrymen and countrywomen, and from the government of Roumania, which banked its war chest in the Russian treasury when it feared the invasion of the Hun. Our political and industrial and ethical systems have nothing in common with the insane conditions prevailing in Russia. As far as we are concerned, Russia has no legal government, and that view is sound logic. The malignant despotism in control over there is no more a legal government than a Chinatown tong on the warpath is.

Another country has attempted to build on the same basis for the benefit of a few radicals in a nation of ignorant and helpless people, and that is Mexico. The Mexican constitution adopted by the Carranza régime in 1917 is a Bolshevik system. Mexico's rulers do not deserve the name of government any more than the Russian bandits do, or the forces under General Chang Tso-Lin, over in China. And Secretary Hughes knows it, and acts intelligently in the matter. He says, no recognition without a treaty guaranteeing American rights and property.

If anybody wants to take a chance on trading in Russia or in Mexico he can do it without our recognizing either one of those Bolshevik "governments." A good deal of trade is actually taking place. One American corporation is said to have established some drug stores in Moscow and Petrograd. A Brooklyn importer penetrated Russia last year and managed to get out with a lot of bristles, of which our brush factories were short. There is nothing to prevent it, except ordinary caution. But it will not take place on a very great scale, because in neither country have the people been left much to trade with, or encouraged to produce more than would barely sustain life. When we refuse to recognize such a system of general tyranny and spoliation we are not adding to their troubles. In Mexico we are merely defending our own people, for recognition would legalize all the confiscations of American property that have taken place under the Bolshevik constitution of Carranza.

Recognition be darned. Leave it to the State Department and the President. We have an administration now to which it is safe to leave such things, with assurance that it will act with due consideration of the facts and by the guidance of right and justice.

The practical limit for suspension bridge spans is estimated by army engineers as 2800 feet.

Since the discovery of the cobalt silver mines in 1903, Ontario has produced over 313,000,000 ounces of silver.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Laurel Hill as a Memorial Park.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 21, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Your article in recent issues on the "California Historical Society" will certainly arouse interest and enthusiasm throughout the state. What you say about the rich and dramatic history of California is striking and true. That we should neglect it is inexcusable; our heritage of history is worthy of more loving care.

In the older states much attention is paid to the care of cemeteries. They are invaluable records of genealogy and history. Often where the paper records have been destroyed, as in the revolutionary war and the war of 1812, records on the "mossy marbles" remain. In the genealogical and biographical magazines of the older states much space is given to the records of the cemeteries. Of those who rest in San Francisco's historic cemeteries many were native sons. There are also many who came from older states to lay the foundations of the new commonwealth.

When Colonel E. D. Baker advanced upon the platform in Portsmouth Square to pronounce the funeral oration over the bier of his friend, Senator Broderick, he uttered these solemn words: "Fellow-citizens, a senator lies dead before you!" No less than eleven United States senators have been entombed in Laurel Hill. Let us hold in reverence their historic resting-place.

On the peak of the highest hill, under the most conspicuous monument in Laurel Hill Cemetery, lies the body of David C. Broderick, elected United States senator from California in 1857. As the result of a quadrangular quarrel, involving Broderick, Gwin, Terry and Perley, the fates brought about a duel between Broderick and Terry, in which Broderick fell. He was buried in Laurel Hill on September 18, 1859. At the impressive funeral services held in the Plaza, Colonel E. D. Baker uttered a fiery philippic against dueling.

Once before Colonel Baker had delivered an eloquent elegiac address to the people of San Francisco—it was on May 30, 1854, when Laurel Hill was dedicated as a cemetery. "In this peaceful spot," he said, "the pioneers will rest forever." It was a momentous occasion in the history of the infant city. A great throng made its way out to the cemetery to listen to Baker's dedication oration. The only road to Laurel Hill wound out around the hills over Pacific Street to the Presidio, and thence to the cemetery gate. Bush Street was not yet planked and graded.

Baker, born in London in 1811, was brought to the United States when five years of age. He fought in the Black Hawk war; he went to Congress from Ohio, leaving his seat to fight in the Mexican war. In 1849 he was again in Congress. In 1851 he was superintendent of the Panama Railroad. In the Vigilante time, Baker defended Charles Cora, who had shot United States Marshal Richardson; for this Baker was ostracized. He left California for Oregon, where he was elected United States senator. When the civil war came on he raised a regiment and took it to the front, and fell in his first fight, at Ball's Bluff, October 21, 1861. He was buried at Laurel Hill within a rod of Broderick.

Not far away is the stately monument erected by Milton S. Latham (1827-1882). Elected governor of California in 1860, he served for five days only, and then resigned to fill the office of United States senator left vacant by Broderick's death.

William M. Gwin, who was elected United States senator from California in 1850, with John C. Frémont, was interred at Laurel Hill in 1885.

James A. McDougall (1819-1867), who succeeded Frémont as senator from California in 1853, was also buried here.

Another United States senator was John Percival Jones, born in 1829. On the bark Eureka he made the entire trip from his home in Cleveland, through the Great Lakes, the Welland Canal, down the St. Lawrence, around Cape Horn and up the Pacific Coast to San Francisco in 1850. He served in the California state senate from 1863 to 1867. He was elected United States senator from Nevada in 1873, and was reelected to the Senate in 1879. He was born in England; he was twice married. Mrs. Frederick MacMonnies, wife of the sculptor, and Mrs. Robert Farquhar are his daughters. He lived to an advanced age; recently his ashes were placed in the imposing vault of Colfax marble which he built at Laurel Hill more than fifty years ago.

William M. Stewart, James G. Fair (1831-1894), and William Sharon (1821-1885), all United States senators from Nevada, were buried in Laurel Hill.

A beautiful white marble tomb marks the resting-place of Aaron Augustus Sargent (1827-1887), "printer, lawyer, minister plenipotentiary, senator." He was elected United States senator from California in 1871.

General John F. Miller (1831-1886), a pioneer of '53, was elected United States senator from California in 1881. He served in the Union army from 1861 to 1865, was collector of the port of San Francisco for four years, and president of the Alaska Commercial Company. His daughter was Mrs. Richardson Clover. His body has been moved from Laurel Hill to Arlington, the National Military Cemetery near Washington; his monument still stands in Laurel Hill.

One of our earliest pioneers was Lieutenant Joseph L. Folsom, U. S. A. (1817-1855). His name is almost hidden under the oaks around his tombstone. Folsom Street was named for him. In 1847 he invested in all the Yerba Buena town lots he could buy, and afterwards bought the entire William A. Leidesdorff estate from the heirs, which made him a very wealthy man. He died at Mission San José.

In a miniature Gothic temple of brown sandstone lies Nicholas Luning—by his side his wife, two sons, a son-in-law, a grandson. Facing the east, its foundation stones built into a bank of velvety lawn, ivy, and geraniums, the Luning monument is unique.

Near by stands the tomb of William S. Clark, a pioneer of '46, who named Clark's Point and there drove the piles for the first wharf in San Francisco Bay.

In the large plot once owned by the Bank of California lies Robert Morrow, the Comstock magnate; he and the late Adam Grant were the principal owners of the old Sutter Street and Geary Street car lines.

Many of the early cemetery deeds were recorded in the city's archives, among them one to R. C. Rogers, in 1869. In early life Rogers was in the navy, and served in the Mexican war. He was president of the Bohemian Club from 1878 to 1880. But one inscription may be read on the white marble slab: "My Wife."

Another Laurel Hill deed recorded in 1869 was that to Reuben H. Lloyd (1836-1900), eminent Mason, distinguished attorney. He never married, and lived nearly all his life at the old home on Folsom Street.

Another eminent Mason buried here was Alexander Abell (1816-1890), with his wife and his daughter Madeline (1856-1888).

"Laurel Hill to Samuel Cowles" was another deed recorded, January 13, 1871. Cowles (1823-1880) was a well-known lawyer in the early days. Of his two handsome daughters, Myra married Joseph D. Redding, and now lives abroad. Anita married Thomas H. Reardon, on whose modest headstone is carved "60th Ohio Infantry."

In a well-kept family plot lies I. C. C. Russ (1785-1857), the founder of the Russ House. After his death his residence on Harrison Street, then in the suburbs, was converted into a popular resort known as the Russ Gardens.

On the crest of Broderick Hill, next to the reservoir, is the family plot of R. B. Woodward, founder of Woodward's Gardens, proprietor of the What Cheer House.

Across the avenue is the tall shaft of Isaac Friedlander (1824-1878), sometimes known as the "Wheat King." His son Carey (1858-1917) was for years secretary of the Merchants' Exchange and of the Chamber of Commerce.

Many of San Francisco's pioneers lie buried at Laurel Hill. Among them are: Thomas H. Selby (1820-1875), who founded the Selby Smelting Works and was once mayor of San Francisco; George Gordon (1820-1869), who laid out South Park and built the first sugar refinery here. (His daughter, Helen Mar, 1845-1874, was once made the heroine of a novel by a well-known writer); Frederick Bee, who died in 1892, and who was for a number of years consul for China in San Francisco; Bailey Sargent (1824-1889); Henry M. Newhall (1825-1882); Mrs. Anastasia Patten, who died in 1888, and her husband, Edmund Patten, who died in 1872. (Their daughter, Mrs. Corbin, resides in Washington, D. C.); Millen Griffith (1827-1896), the well-known shipping man; José Godoy, who died in 1869, and who was consul from Mexico to the United States.

The most elaborate monument in Laurel Hill is Senator Fair's—a copy of the gothic Sainte Chapelle at Paris, built by St. Louis as a shrine for the Crown of Thorns.

The most laconic epitaph in Laurel Hill is that carved on Judge Sanderson's massive slab:

SILAS W. SANDERSON
FINAL DECREE

The most imposing monument in Laurel Hill is that of the Bourn family. It stands on a height, looking toward the ocean; from its base descends a sheer cliff—an ancient quarry. The monument is a pyramid—that form which in Egypt has for centuries defied the sandstorms sweeping from the Libyan desert, and which has even more successfully defied the vandal hand of man.

A PIONEER'S DAUGHTER.

The American Plan.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 18, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: San Francisco mechanics have struck to strengthen their unions. Frankly, they say so. They raised no issue as to wages or hours; gave no excuse; quite nonchalantly they walked out, merely remarking, as though casually, "We don't work any longer with non-union men." And by their action San Franciscans are again invited to meditate upon "closed shop" or "open shop."

"We won't work any longer with non-union men." That admits of but one interpretation, namely: If a mechanic is not a member of a union he shall not be permitted to work at his trade. Those contending for the "open shop" declare that any mechanic may work at his trade any time, anywhere; that every workman who desires to work shall have equal opportunity to do so; in short, that the opportunity to work shall not be confined to the members of a particular class.

I wonder if the lesson of the big midsummer strike in England last year has been forgotten? But that the leaders of that strike fumbled at the last moment, three great union brotherhoods would have overturned the government of Great Britain and precipitated anarchy. In England all of the trades are unionized. No such thing as "open shop" is known there. But, when comparisons are made, it must be remembered that in England laborers are all Englishmen, while in this country laborers, for the most part, are a hodgepodge of all nationalities—many unable to speak English, many anarchists, communists, I. W. W.s, acknowledging no allegiance to government, restrained from violating law and order only by fear of punishment: because of whose activities it became necessary for legislatures in Western states to enact stringent laws against acts of syndicalism—aneant the necessity for which legislation, the fire losses in the grain fields of California caused by the I. W. W. a few years ago (amounting to about $10,000,000), and, as well, the prosecutions and convictions for "criminal syndicalism" in the various counties of the state, bear eloquent testimony.

There are not only obvious but ominous reasons why labor unions in this country should not be indulged nor dallied with as has been the case in England. Even in England, where the laboring class is homogeneous, there is an ever-increasing danger to the state. That is obvious. What, then, might we expect if the labor unions of the United States possessed such power or solidarity as those of England possess?

Every one ought to be familiar with the facts of contemporary history, especially should the sober-minded thinking men be familiar therewith, and consider their ways in their light. In our day a strike like the strike first referred to is not to be thought of as negligible; it means more than the casual fact that a few hundred working men have walked out; behind it lies a threat—a menace. Only a few days ago Samuel Gompers, in addressing the Chicago meeting of the American Federation of Labor, took occasion expressly to denounce the One Big Union (an International or Soviet idea) and to lash Foster, a Chicago labor leader, who stood there as its protagonist. The O. B. U. is radical and dangerous. Mr. Gompers, indeed, is opposed to it, but Mr. Gompers is a very old man, and there is a great possibility that his successor may be a radical.

Many believe that the strike first referred to (ordered by Eastern leaders) was much more than a casual strike in the intent of those leaders; they believe that the idea behind the strike was and is a continuing menace, not to be disregarded, much less thought of negligibly, but to be guarded against and fought against. If that conclusion is fair, then all of the potentialities of such a strike must be brought into the estimate—the economic of course, the political as well—and a defense provided. For the menace is not to the builders: the menace is to society.

True to Her Trust.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 30, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: Please accept my heartiest thanks and congratulations for the excellent editorial in your issue of April 29th, entitled "The Faith of France."

I have observed with amazement the complacency, the lack of appreciation, with which the world regards France's splendid sacrifices to the general interest since the war.

I can claim no drop of French blood, but there are some of us who will never forget what France has done for the world. And we remember that since the days when Caesar was holding back the German barbarians from the cultivated fields of France with the strong arm of his legions, the French have had that same task handed down to them from generation to generation. They may have to serve civilization in like manner again.

Yours very truly, H. M. F.

There were 425,022 persons ten years of age and over in the State of New York in 1920 unable to write in any language. In New York City there were 281,121 illiterates, of whom 270,788 were foreign-born whites.

SOCIALISM'S EFFORT IN CALIFORNIA.

Proposed Water and Power Amendment Is Not Merely Bad Business But Worse Political Building

Even if the proposed Water and Power Amendment to the Constitution, to be voted upon next November, involved nothing more than the price at which the consumer could buy his energy and light and get water for irrigation, the project of turning over a vast and technical industry to a board of political appointees to manage and control would not be politically wise.

The value of our institutions is not to be measured by the price of electric energy; nor would any one familiar with the technique and discipline, the continuous research and invention, involved in the management of the great power companies of California ever expect improvement either in price or service from a state bureau; much less from a state bureau the heads of which are still unknown, but who are to be endowed with practically limitless powers, and to be without effective check on their disposal of half a billion dollars to be raised by a blanket mortgage on the property of every citizen in the state. If price alone were involved, the proposal would look like a more desperate gamble than Comstocks on a five-point margin, or wild-cat oil shares—less chance of winning, more likelihood that the commodity it is proposed to sell would cost more instead of less. In fact, a larger charge is virtually assured by the provision for paying off the principal of each project; something private corporations do not attempt and for which they do not tax the consumer.

But that is far from the most important consideration. Government in this country does not exist to provide water and energy, but liberty, opportunity, and security. Business men are too apt to debate the Water and Power Act as though it were merely a business matter. It is not. It is an effort to revolutionize in this important field the political system on which this nation has developed, and it is the greatest effort thus far made in that direction, at least in time of peace, unless we count as effort the crank proposals for nationalizing the railroads and everything else. Not even North Dakota has attempted socialism on so extensive a scale; it had no industry, except its agriculture, that was so large and important, and even the North Dakota socialists and their dupes did not attempt the political production of wheat. If they had, the valley of the Volga would now be a land flowing with milk, honey, pork spareribs and caviare compared with North Dakota.

And North Dakota had something to grumble about. It had been used with less than generosity by the millers of Minneapolis and St. Paul, and the grain graders of their Chamber of Commerce, and the agriculture of the state was not very prosperous in the first place and probably never can be until they diversify it more, no matter how financed. California has no just complaints of its water and power corporations. They are efficiently conducted, and the rates are made by the railroad commission. They are probably regulated too much now for the public's good. For a corporation to have to go to some political appointees to ask permission to issue bonds, to be sold on the public market to grown-up people over twenty-one years of age, is ridiculous; however, we have such an arrangement, and it ought to satisfy the most meddlesome busybodies in the community; but apparently we have some that are past satisfying as long as anybody is making a profit. This is the true socialist spirit. In socialism there is no room for profit, according to the teachings of its bush-whiskered old dervish, Karl Marx. And without profit Russia has found that there is no production.

Now it is a peculiarity of revolutions that they do not originate with and are not carried out by the proletariat, which according to the socialists has been despoiled and should be feeling desperate, but among and by middle-class doctrinaires of strange beliefs. The proletariat does not ordinarily wish revolution until it is led by some meddler with a scheme. And that is what has developed in California. Our farming class, too, is generally prosperous. Our people have no such grievances as those of North Dakota, for example. They are merely in danger of being misled by a vision and a dream. But the danger is no less real for that.

The worst thing that could happen for the state would be to have the Water and Power Act carry and then become a success—in the only way in which the success of such a project is ever measured: that is, by its money returns. That would encourage the formation of other socialistic projects, until the state was a socialistic state. No such order of society could long feed itself, without reducing the people to driven slaves. They tried it in Russia. Even after they had reduced the people to driven slaves they found what society has always found, that slave labor is the most expensive and nearly profitless in the world, that adequate modern production could not be maintained by means of it, and that unless they were all to starve together it would be necessary to denationalize industry. So

Russia began to denationalize industry and invite capital to return. And just as Russia is denationalizing industry, California is invited to begin nationalizing it, and serving notice on capital to keep out.

The great dynamo of all human affairs, the prime mover that makes industry go and brings food and houses and civilization with all its arts, is the hope of private profit. Anybody that supposes it can be discarded for some lovely, altruistic principle of co-operation for the general good is politically at sea. He should be treated with kindness, unless he gets to pitching bombs, but he should not receive support for any of his ideas, for they are all certain to be based on a diseased belief in what is called the "exploitation of labor," to fatten the ribs of capital. They will be beautifully consistent, beautifully logical, difficult to refute if you grant his first premise. But they will not work, and their introduction into general human conduct merely interferes with the things that will work and are working for the general benefit.

For example, if this Water and Power Act were to be adopted by the people next November, it would be extremely hard to interest capital in any more development in California, at least on any scale commensurate with our needs. The thing is so manifestly unfair that men with money would not consider that they could be sure of receiving justice here. If after inducing capitalists to invest their money, their time, and the best efforts of their lives in the development of power projects, we are to set up state competition with them and endow an unknown political board with the power to condemn parts of their laboriously woven web and leave the rest a wreck, taking their business away from them because it looks profitable, what is to become of our reputation for justice and fair dealing? How safe is capital to consider California as a field for investment? How attractive is a California bond issue going to look when it is advertised in the New York Times for New York investors to buy?

Advocates of the act claim the state can borrow money cheaper than private corporations, and can, therefore, produce power cheaper, for it is merely a matter of the interest charge on the capital required. North Dakota did not find it so; and in harmony with the socialist tendency to blame the wicked owners of money for all their woes the North Dakota socialist politicians complained that they were being boycotted. But when men engage in visionary projects that other men know can not succeed, and when those other men are of the sort that have the money because they do understand such things, boycotts like that are very apt to happen, and it does not require any conspiracy to bring them about. Bond buyers that are intelligent about security are very apt to act alike without any preliminary agreement. They simply analyze business undertakings, and nearly all get the same answer.

It will be that way if California exhausts her credit by this vast issue or authorization. The market, after the North Dakota experience, will probably be very shy of half a billion dollars worth of bonds when the money is to be gambled on a project of state socialism. There is a limit to credit. It will not stretch indefinitely. And after the half-billion of bonds is marketed, if it ever is, what chance will there be for the state to borrow more money at need, unless this venture becomes a success? If that should happen, we might continue borrowing, until everybody owed all he had to the state and socialism was here. But long before that happened, the office-holders would have multiplied until everybody had a public job, with 98 per cent. loafing instead of working. Productive efficiency would have fallen to a minimum, as in Russia, and paralysis would have set in and crippled us beyond repair. We could not go far on that road before we reached a condition of exhausted credit and paralyzed ambition.

This bill is a direct frontal attack on private capital and the system of individual industry. That is why it is of such interest to those who seek to build their fortunes on industrial discontent. And business is in a poor position to defend itself, because it is selfish, and knows it, and knows that everybody else knows it. But out of that selfishness come the results that humanity has to have. The selfishness of capital, the hope of private profit—no beautiful thing, we grant—has produced all we know or are ever likely to know of what we call civilization. With all its defects, the individualistic system feeds, clothes, and shelters us. It gives us the liberal arts and the fine arts as well, for even an artist has to be capitalized. Every commodity known to trade, everything advertised in a street-car, a magazine, on a billboard or in a newspaper, everything in the White House or a Woolworth store, in a plumbing shop or a lumber yard, is accessible to us, if we have the price, because some capitalist hopes to make money out of it. Without that there is nothing. Witness Russia again.

These are sordid rather than poetic truths; but they are the only truths that will work, and so they are the only truths that are true. The fact that we have to have the price is a calamity, of course, involving for the vast masses of us that primal curse of mankind known as work. In other words we must all, practically speaking, produce something, and that is co-operation. But if we thought we could get the stuff we need for nothing we would not work to get it, any more than the capitalist would do his part in production when deprived of the hope of private profit. There are individual exceptions to the rule, but they are rare, and not of sufficient importance to promise anything worth while or to build any plans upon.

Socialists complain that they have great difficulty converting the clerk class to their dismal gospel. That is because the clerk class works close to the capitalist class, and sees something, although dimly, of the essential toil directed by the keenest intelligence which the capitalist class devotes to its work. The socialist supposes that money makes money, and that to make it, it is only necessary to have a stake, like a gambler with a system. They made that mistake in North Dakota when the only state-operated bank in the country lent the money of its depositors to politicians. They thought "money makes money, and it's our turn." They did not mean to lose it; they just did not understand. Money does not make money. It takes money and brains, great abilities, genius and experience. Making money is one of the hardest tests of intelligence and character. There is nothing easy about it. Business men labor for every dollar the money in their care earns. And as they do it they supply us with the necessities of life and with its beauties and embellishments as well, if we know how to pick them. Capitalism is the mother and father of civilization. We shall never do without some form of it—we never have, since we came down out of the trees and crawled into the caves that were our early homes. It is now proposed that in order to put capital out of business we mortgage the property of every man, woman, and child in California and hand the money to politicians to play water and power with—it might as well be rouge et noir—as the money of the depositors in the Bank of North Dakota was lent to inexperienced persons. When they have lost the money, what? Why this bill would enable them to dip into the treasury for more. That is to be expressly provided in the Constitution, not in a statute that can be repealed or modified by the legislature if wisdom so directs. The proposed amendment distinctly states:

The full faith and credit of the State of California is hereby pledged for the payment of the principal of said bonds, as the same mature, and the interest accruing thereon as the same falls due. . . . If at any time the revenues from projects shall be insufficient to pay the interest on and principal of outstanding bonds as the same falls due, the committee, with the consent of the governor, in order to avoid appropriations from the general fund and resulting taxation, may issue and sell bonds to provide funds required to make such payments of interest or principal. . . . If at any time the moneys in the state treasury applicable to the payment of interest or principal of said bonds shall be insufficient to pay the same as it falls due, moneys shall be temporarily advanced from the general fund for that purpose, and there is hereby appropriated from the general fund in the treasury such sum annually as will be necessary to pay such interest and principal, and there shall be collected each year in the same manner and at the same time as other state revenue is collected such sum in addition to the other revenues of the state as shall be required to pay the sums appropriated for payment of interest and principal as herein provided, and it is hereby made the duty of all officers charged by law with any duty with regard to the levy and collection of said revenue to do and perform each and every act which shall be necessary to collect such additional sum. (Italics ours.)

Lenin has not much more power than that, at least over the revenues.

No wonder this project has the approval of the local chapter of the Non-Partisan League! That is where the Non-Partisan League exposed its friends. Its California organ endorsed the measure, thereby proving what sort of measure it is and what sort of support it has—socialistic. MORTON TODD.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 3, 1922.

Looking over the authoritative lists of governmental employees in every land it becomes obvious that woman has not yet broken in, except in elective posts like members of legislative bodies, mayors, and other municipal dignities. In the realm of statecraft, except to gain the rôle of confidential secretary to some big executive, she sings very small, despite the high chorus of feminists in every part of the world. Not a single woman has achieved a diplomatic post. Even the Soviet government of Russia, which promised so much to women in the early days, has gradually replaced the few feminine envoys sent to Finland and to Estonia by men. Sweden has several women counselors in the historical rôles of school directors and health officers, but these had been given to the gentler sex years before the general agitation about equal rights. This country simply refuses to consider a woman as diplomatic envoy, no matter to what country, and a woman cabinet official looks very far below the horizon just at present. From Russia comes the amusing statement that married women proved a tough nut to crack, because of the presence of their husbands with no official status and yet evidently expectant. This country has as yet been spared the thrill which will come inevitably when a married congresswoman arrives with her family and causes a revision in the existing laws of precedence.

France recognizes the value of air travel and its importance to the future. She has budgeted 154,878,000 francs for civilian aviation for the year 1922. Naturally, Paris is the great centre of French commercial aviation, the Le Bourget aerodrome in the suburbs taking on the appearance of a busy railway terminal. Airplanes to and from London (five departures daily) and Brussels carry the largest number of passengers.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Senator Reed Smoot of Utah is the Senate Finance Committee's storehouse of figures and expert knowledge of tariff legislation. In fact, Senator Smoot has an encyclopædic knowledge of the history and ramifications of American industry, which he vocally publishes on occasion in the Senate.

The world checkers championship was recently determined in Glasgow with Mr. Hewart, an Englishman, as victor with two games over the American contestant, W. Banks, who had one game to his credit. The tournament, which lasted two weeks consisted of forty games, thirty-seven of which were drawn.

Fatma, a woman corporal in the Turkish army, has been given the rank of lieutenant in the Nationalist army, earning her promotion in action against the Greeks. It is the highest military rank held by a Turkish woman, though the Turkish army boasts several battalions of women who have shown great bravery and suffered heavy casualties.

M. Amable Maillet-Saint-Prix, a Parisian journalist, who was born in 1821 and is therefore in his hundred and second year, is in all probability the oldest journalist alive. He is at least the oldest working newspaperman, for he is still vigorous and not only writes a weekly article in the Abeille de Seine-et-Oise, published in Corbeil, but actually makes up the paper.

Edward L. Conn, until recently proprietor and publisher of the Foreign News Service, which specializes in American diplomatic developments abroad, has gone to Toko to become editor of an English language newspaper there, the Japan Times and Mail. Tokyo, though only the size of Philadelphia, has more daily newspapers than Philadelphia, Chicago, and New York combined.

Miss Blondelle Malone of Georgia is a specialist in garden-painting. Miss Malone, who comes of a family of artists, was a landscape painter until she met a certain English princess who owns many estates, and particularly many gardens, the latter of which she has a hobby for having painted. Miss Malone became the princess' official garden painter and has been a garden specialist ever since.

The heir to the Ottoman throne, Abdul Medjid, is something new in the way of Eastern potentates. According to European papers his life in Constantinople is a model of democracy. The future Commander of the Faithful, who is fifty years old, intensely enjoys the liberty of which he was deprived for thirty years by Abdul Hamid. He is said to divide his activities between music, painting, and writing. His library is stored with French books. His favorite writer is Anatole France, his favorite composer Beethoven. Two interesting signs of regeneration of the Ottoman Empire are the facts that Abdul Medjid can be approached without Oriental ceremony and that he has suppressed the harem of the palace.

Ilya Tolstoi, who is visiting America as an outspoken opponent of recognition of the Bolshevik government, is carrying on the philosophy of passive resistance of his illustrious father, Leo Tolstoi. Our Russian visitor looks for a complete collapse of the régime of Lenin and Trotzky this summer. The two dictators, he says, are even now in peril of crashing from their heights because the Russian treasury is getting low. Mr. Tolstoi prophesies that when the government funds are depleted the red army will turn upon its masters. The younger Tolstoi, who is said to bear a strong resemblance to his philosophic sire, would dissuade American and Allied loans to Russia on the ground that it would prolong the agony of the peasantry under Bolshevik rule.

Dr. A. F. Ossendowsky, who played an important part in the Czarist régime, having been a member of the technical committee of the imperial navy and of the foreign trade department, is attending the Genoa Conference at the request of France in order to place before the nations represented there the actual state of affairs in Russia. Dr. Ossendowsky is in a position to expound Russian affairs because of his long and varied connection with the old Russian government. He was a director of the All-Russian Council of Gold and Platinum Mine-Owners and for nine years served as secretary for industries to Count Witte. During the Washington Conference Dr. Ossendowsky was attached to the Polish legation as adviser on Far Eastern affairs. He is the author of "Beasts, Men, and Gods," a volume on Siberia.

Mr. William Phillips, the new Under Secretary of State, who has been chosen to succeed Henry P. Fletcher, recently sent to Belgium as ambassador, is one of the most capable of the younger men who were encouraged by President Roosevelt to enter our diplomatic service as a career. Mr. Phillips graduated at Harvard in 1900 and after studying law for several years went to London as private secretary to Ambassador Choate. Later he was transferred to the American Legation in China, and in 1907 he returned to take charge of our Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. His next step was to become Third Assistant Secretary of State. Later he was First Secretary of our embassy at London, after which he again became Third Assistant Secretary of State, and finally Assistant Secretary. He has been minister to Holland since March, 1920. In his present position of Under Secretary, Mr. Phillips ranks next to Secretary Hughes. He was a member of the national commission to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

Sir Horace Curzon Plunkett, veteran Irish statesman and scholar, and the apostle of a modernized Ireland, is recognized as the forefront of the cooperative movement in Irish agriculture. Sir Horace has held many public positions in Ireland and has been ceaseless in his endeavors to heal the breach between Ulster and the South. He believes that economic, social, and educational advancement must prepare the way for Irish political freedom. It is interesting to note that Sir Horace Plunkett, who has long been interested in our country and our problems, has published a work on "The Rural Life Problem in the United States" and has been active in improving the condition of Southern negroes. For a number of years Sir Horace has engaged in cattle ranching on our Western plains. His practical wisdom, his vast knowledge, and his political vision have given him a place of remarkable influence throughout the English-speaking world.

Lone Mountain.

(CEMETERY, SAN FRANCISCO.)

This is that hill of awe
That Persian Sindbad saw,—
The mount magnetic;
And on its seaward face,
Scattered along its base,
The wrecks prophetic.

Here come the argosies
Blown by each idle breeze,
To and fro shifting;
Yet to the bill of Fate
All drawing, soon or late,—
Day by day drifting;

Drifting forever here
Barks that for many a year
Braved wind and weather;
Shallops but yesterday
Launched on yon shining bay,—
Drawn all together.

This is the end of all:
Sun thyself by the wall,
O poorer Hindbad!
Envy not Sindbad's fame:
Here come alike the same
Hindbad and Sindbad. —Bret Harte.

A Memory of Earth.

In the west dusk silver sweet,
Down the violet-scented ways,
As I moved with quiet feet
I was met by mighty days.

On the hedge the hanging dew
Glass'd the eve and stars and skies;
While I gazed a madness grew
Into thunder'd battle-cries.

Where the hawthorn glimmered white
Flashed the spear and fell the stroke,
Ah, what faces pale and bright
Where the dazzling battle broke!

There a hero-hearted queen
With young beauty lit the van.
Gone! the darkness flowed between
All the ancient wars of man.

While I paced the valley's gloom,
Where the rabbits patter'd near,
Shone a temple and a tomb
With a legend carved clear:

Time put by a myriad fates
That her day might dawn in glory:
Death made wide a million gates
So to close her tragic story.
—A. E. (George William Russell).

The Ivory Gate.

When, loved by poet and painter,
The sunrise fills the sky,
When night's gold urns wax fainter,
And in depths of amber die—
When the morn-breeze stirs the curtain,
Bearing an odorous freight . . .
Then visions strange, uncertain,
Pour thick through the Ivory Gate.

Then the oars of Ithaca dip so
Silently into the sea,
That they wake not sad Calypso—
And the hero wanders free:
He breasts the ocean-furrows,
At war with the words of Fate,
And the blue tide's low sussurus
Comes up to the Ivory Gate.

Or, clad in hide of leopard,
Mid Ida's freshest dews,
Paris, the Teuciran shepherd,
His sweet Oenone woos:
On the thought of her coming bridal Unuttered joy doth wait,
While the tune of the false one's idyl
Rings soft through the Ivory Gate.

Or down from green Helvellyn
The sough of streams I hear,
And my lazy sail is swelling—
To the winds of Windermere:
That girl with the rustic bodice
Mid the ferry's laughing freight
Is as fair as any goddess
Who sweeps through the Ivory Gate.

Ah, the vision of dawn is leisure—
But the truth of day is toil,
And we pass from dreams of pleasure
To the world's unstayed turmoil.
Perchance, beyond the River
Which guards the realms of Fate,
Our spirits may dwell for ever
Mid dreams of the Ivory Gate.

MONGRELIZING AMERICA.

Kenneth L. Roberts Tells "Why Europe Leaves Home," and How It Affects This Country.

As long as the self-celebrated human race is what it is now there will be no end to explanations of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire; also the Athenian, share and share alike. If the Romans, who were declining and falling for several centuries, could only have stopped it long enough to tell us why they were doing it, much ink would have been saved; but controversialists would have been deprived of their favorite argument against anything they did not happen to admire, from the farmer bloc to tight boots. They could not have said that the object of their antipathy, whatever that might be, was what caused the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, because there would have been, in some form of imperishable bronze, or graven deep in marble, the authentic explanation by the declining and falling Romans themselves, who were the only people on earth that ever knew—if they did know; and as they devoted themselves to their own ruin with all the joyful enthusiasm of a post-Volsteadian drunkard, they must have known something as to the reasons for their rash act. But they do not appear to have cared whether we knew about that business or not, and so the guessing about it, and the pretense of understanding it, have been for long a favorite amusement of our confessed cognoscenti.

Among whom we must classify Kenneth L. Roberts, for he has certainly cognoscated a good deal abroad that the folks at home ought to know. And from rambling around Europe after the war he has evolved his own pet antipathy, which is unrestricted immigration, and his own explanation of the basis of Gibbon's mighty work, which is, in one word, mongrelization. It is not inconsistent with David Starr Jordan's biological theory that war drained away the best blood of the nation and left only the muleteers and camp followers and roustabouts and sutlers and scuttlers and scuttlers to carry on with the daughters of the regiment. Those carriers-on were foreign labor, imported to do the work the native Roman or the native Greek should have done. They seemed a fine thing to have, for they solved the servant problem of that time, but look at those nations now, Mr. Roberts would say. Quite true. Look at them. And then look at us. We have the world by the cervical vertebrae, so to speak; but for how long?

Greece points his moral as well as Rome—they both declined and fell, and probably from similar causes. Boston suggests Athens, and so in Mr. Roberts' pages this comparison occurs:

It might be mentioned in passing that the last census showed that the population of Boston, sometimes known as the Athens of America, consisted of some three hundred thousand native-born Americans and some four hundred thousand aliens.

The aliens and slaves of Ancient Athens spoke the Greek tongue and they wore the Greek dress, but they were not Greeks. Citizenship was conferred on them, so that they might fight the battles of Greece. The result was inevitable. Any promiscuous crossing of breeds invariably produces mongrels, whether the crossing occurs in dogs or in humans, and whether it takes place in the Valley of the Nile or on the Attic plain or in the shadow of Rome's seven hills or along the stern and rock-bound shores of New England. People whose trust in catch-words is greater than their common sense are fatuous enough to believe that by pouring all the races of Europe in a human melting-pot, one can keep on producing the same breed of men that founded America, laid down its scheme of government, wrenched its farms and its cities from the wilderness, and produced its scientists, statesmen, artists, pioneers, authors and explorers. It is no more possible to do this than it is to turn a yapping, snarling pile of Pekinese, Chows, pugs, Boston terriers, poodles, beagles, collies, coach-dogs, wolf-hounds and mongrels into a kennel and have them produce litters of thoroughbred setters.

This mongrelization theory is the lesson Mr. Roberts wishes to convey to his country through his book, "Why Europe Leaves Home," and as it seems to us a good and sound one politically and economically, although there may be some doubt about the thing biologically, we are glad to help by calling attention to certain of his tenets. He is not sentimental about welcoming "the oppressed of every nation." That good old Fourth-of-July platitude seems to have been worn out on him. He does not appear to feel that the modern immigrant is likely to bring us any helpful respect for liberty and law nor any cooperation in operating them. He finds the uneasy, disgruntled, impoverished European desperate to get to America, but with little thought for America and much for himself and his flattened pocket-book. And he doesn't seem to believe that we can prosper as a nation much farther unless this flood is brought under control. He says:

Careful investigation in various parts of Europe has shown conclusively that if the United States should remove the ban on immigrants, emigration from Ireland to the United States would be at least three times as large in the ensuing five years as it was in the five years before the war; that five million people would emigrate from Germany in the ten years following the lifting of the ban, and that the majority of them would steer straight for America; that emigration from Italy to America for many years would be limited only by the number of passenger steamers assigned to the task of carrying immigrants to America from Italy. The same thing that is true of Italy is true of the new nations which used to be Austria-Hungary. Immigrants to America from these nations would fill every ship that is supplied for that purpose for years to come—unless America becomes permanently convinced that her chances of assimilating this mass of humanity is even less than a humming-bird's chances of assimilating a box of carpet-tacks.

It is the threatened influx from southeastern Europe that seems most to have disturbed the author's equanimity, if he has any choice of evils. His pictures of the human breed in certain quarters are vivid and alarming, but we must limit ourselves to his more general statements; and here is a sketch of underlying human nature in the remains of Central Europe:

The people in the old Austria-Hungary ranged all the way from the refined and cultured individuals who lived in the great centres like Prague and Vienna and Budapest, used whipped-cream on their chocolate and murmured mutinously when there were fewer than fifty beautiful women in the ballet of "Faust," down to the hard-boiled Russians who wore sheepskin undergarments and slept on the mud floor of the living-room with the heifers and the pigs. They differed widely from one another in their traditions, their history, their religions, their languages, their cultures and their national costumes. They had only a few things in common: not one of the different peoples of old Austria-Hungary was ever satisfied with its government; each nationality had a bitter, passionate, and unwavering hatred for at least one adjoining nationality; and all of them wanted to go to America. In these things they were alike.

Certain peculiarities of our Slav brothers have impressed themselves on the author's mind and caused him to suspect that their facile assimilation to the American spirit and American institutions is largely bunk—or so we would infer from the following affectionate tribute:

Now all of the Slav races have certain peculiarities which are apt to make them dangerous members of large industrial communities. They are easily influenced; they will not acknowledge one another's equality; and they seize every opportunity to crush ruthlessly the people over whom they have a temporary advantage. The Russian, though he is a Slav, oppressed his brother Pole, who is a Slav, too. The Poles turned around and did the same thing to the Ruthenians, who are also Slavs. The Poles and the Czechs, Slavs all, consider themselves infinitely superior to each other. The Czechs rate themselves far above the Slovaks, while the Slovaks scorn the Russians with unbridled vigor, though the Russians are Slavs, too. The Czechs and the Jugo-Slavs are doing to the Austrians and the Hungarians the same thing that caused them to protest so violently against Austrian and Hungarian rule. These traits make them easy plucking for the labor agitator. When somebody tells them that they have been frightfully oppressed by being forced to accept wages of forty-two dollars a week, that the owners of the steel mills are vile creatures, and that the mills really belong to the workmen instead of the owners, they believe it, emit a hoarse Slav cheer of approval, and hunt around for bricks to bounce against the heads of the oppressive mill-owners. If they are assured in a loud voice that somebody is trying to rob them of their deserts, whether the deserts be a piece of land, a piece of pie, or peace of mind, they believe it implicitly, and riot and shed blood over it. Life for the Slav races for centuries has been just one riot after another. They have been brought up to break the laws of the people who govern them, and to fight them in open and in underhanded ways.

As to the devotion to American ideals among the oppressed peoples of Europe, and what might be called the "old home week" principle in immigration, he has this to say:

Advocates of unrestricted immigration frequently state flatly, and always imply, that present-day emigration from Europe is entirely wives to husbands or vice versa, and children to parents or vice versa. This is erroneous and misleading. Our immigration for the last thirty years has always been an immigration of relatives because of the inexhaustible European relative crop. The beet crop may fall down with a thud; the potato crop may freeze; the whiskey crop may be weak and backward; but the relative crop has always flourished and will always continue to flourish in Europe with a luxuriance that will make the green bay-tree, long noted for its flourishing powers, look like a wilted lettuce-leaf. This fact was determined years ago by the United States Immigration Commission. The relatives in America advertised in their letters the soft jobs that were to be had; and the relatives promptly came across, as one might say. There is nothing about immigration, as the present-day generation knows it, which demands any excess of sympathy, or any rush of sentimentality to the head.

I wish to repeat with all possible emphasis a statement which I have made many times before, and which a prolonged investigation of post-war emigration from the Baltic to the Balkans has continued to confirm: The tremendous movement of people from Europe to America which has been in progress for the last twenty years, and the even more tremendous one which is in prospect unless immigration is restricted with an iron hand, is purely, simply, and solely an economic movement. It is a movement which must not be misrepresented by sentimentalists and near-Americans as being a movement of oppressed people in search of religious or any other freedom. It must not be misrepresented as a sentimental journey to long-lost and passionately-missed relatives. It is a movement to a better job: a movement from the worst of economic conditions to the best of economic conditions: a movement of people from the lowest social and economic layer of Europe to a country where European standards of living are a menace to workmen, health, and institutions. Since this emigration is what it is, our lawmakers not only have every right in the world to control it in every respect and to cut it down to the irreducible minimum, but they also owe it to their country and to their people to see that it is controlled and cut down. And it might also be mentioned that they owe it to their children to see that the America in which they will have to live shall not be misruled and ruined by the mongrelization which must inevitably result from the promiscuous cross-breeding in America of every race in existence.

The future of America depends on the men she breeds. God has not given to America a special brand of ozone that enables her to ride triumphant over the laws of nature; and the hazy dreams of sentimentalists and the partisan desires of alien societies are poor substitutes for straight thinking and the inflexible rules of biology.

We are a practical people, despite our sentimental mushiness. When anybody complains of anything, from weather to cutworms, it is an American habit to ask, "What are you going to do about it?" Mr. Roberts makes this pertinent suggestion:

Congress has a bad habit of getting cold feet whenever there is a howl from alien interests over the hardships of any law that restricts immigration. When it gets cold feet, it at once decides to throw away the offending measure and frame up another temporary law that will bring fewer complaints. This can't be done. If Congress wishes—as the country wishes—a law which shall restrict immigration properly, it must steel itself to complaints; for the alien interests in America will always emit agonized shrieks at any restrictions, no matter how mild they may be.

Immigration is too big and important a matter to the people of America to be controlled completely either by the Department of Labor or the Department of State. As long as these two departments have control of immigration, it will continue to be messed up by politics and by the hopeless incompetency of political appointees whose chief knowledge of the immigration problem consists of the belief that all male immigrants wear brown corduroy trousers and gold earrings and rub garlic in their hair.

Immigration is a matter which, to be properly handled, should be supervised and controlled by a Federal commission of five or seven men who have either made a careful study of immigration or who possess unusual qualifications for membership in such a commission. It should be the same sort of organization as the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it should be entirely removed from politics. If politics were allowed to enter into it, it would be subjected to the same apparently irresistible pressure to which our senators and congressmen were being subjected in 1920 and 1921 by so many near-Americans. The commission might, for example, be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; but, however it were selected, it should be non-political.

The proper immigration law, then, would create a Federal commission to have entire and unhampered control of the administration of the law; and the law would clearly define the commission's duties.

It is our optimistic author's idea that this commission, having been duly appointed and having a man-sized job ahead of it with no elections to fear, and only an occasional theatrical growl out of a really relieved Congress, would function instead of funk; that it might stop immigration temporarily when the labor market was glutted, and let in a little when more was needed; moreover, that it should have and exercise power to direct the stream to places where it was really needed instead of letting it stagnate and breed social malaria in city slums. Perhaps intelligence could be introduced into the business, at least as much as there is in the business of importing fruit; so that we should not receive more alligator pears when we already had too many and needed bananas or pineapples—in other words, that when there was a shortage of miners and no Americans wanted the jobs, the immigration commission could send to the proper part of Hungary for more miners, and if vine dressers were wanted to make sure of the vintage under the dry laws it might encourage some to come from Italy. This would be more intelligent than intelligence tests, and more important in its results than finding out whether an immigrant said he intended becoming a citizen and could read the label on a can of beans in English. When there were five millions out of work in this country, as there were said to be in 1921, although it was exaggerated, no more would be permitted to enter and snap up the jobs for which Americans were suffering. Unskilled labor would not be permitted to infest the slum cities, and any that did not conform to requirements would be deported. That would be at least as intelligent as the practices of Murray & Ready's employment office, which makes it seem unlikely to happen through any political commission or agency.

This book is written "from de-propagandized information gathered in England, Scotland, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Danzig, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Turkey, and Greece, in the years 1920 and 1921." There are some wonderful pictures of the swarming of humanity, after the great disturbance of its ancient ant-nests. But it is not all gloomy. There were bright spots, even in Constantinople among the Russian refugees—such bright spots as this:

One of the prettiest girls that I ever saw was rushing cabbage soup from the kitchen to the tables. She was twenty-two years old, and her hair was the color of corn-silk in early September, and her eyes were as blue as—well, any magazine editor who was handed a colored photograph of her to use on the cover of his magazine would burst into tears of gratitude. Around her neck she had a triple string of pearls about as large as buck-shot. These were the genuine articles. The young woman was the Princess Vododskaya, a Tartar princess from Turkestan; and I don't mind saying that since I have seen her, the expression "Cream of Tartar" conveys more of a picture to me than it did some time ago.

And here is a picture of simple joys among the people whose homely and beautiful life is enshrined in the immortal verse of "The Cotter's Saturday Night":

As a result of their persistent tampering with hard liquor, the Scotch are able to produce some very finished specimens of the souse family. Saturday night, in any Scotch city or town, sees more whole-hearted ossication and spiffication than it sees anywhere else. There is, indeed, a belief in many parts of Scotland that Scotch water has an evil effect on the teeth; and strangers are urged warningly to "look what it does to iron." The Scotch also believe that water rusts and eats away the veins and the arteries and the internal organs, while whisky purifies and toughens and preserves them. If this is so, there are some Scotchmen who ought to live to be a million years old.

There is a refreshing vigor in Mr. Roberts' style, and a scornful, corrosive humor that is far more likely to etch its way into the case-hardened consciousness of the average congressman than any amount of mere vituperation. In fact, vituperation has about the same effect on a politician as profanity on a Duroc; he goes right on eating. This is a good book, and it may do good. It is dedicated to Booth Tarkington, who is a good American and a good fellow.

BANKING AND INVESTMENT NEWS.

San Francisco bank clearings for the week ending April 29, 1922, were $133,000,000; for the corresponding week of last year, $117,600,000; an increase of $15,400,000.

The prosperity of the United States depends largely upon the prosperity of our so-called public utilities. We can not be successful as a nation unless the corporations that supply us with power, heat, light, transportation, and the means of communication petitive company, for only one corporation controlled all the cars. The same thing was true in the matter of light, gas, and telephone service. The consequence was that Mr. Citizen generally sought to obtain his revenge through supporting the enactment of legislative measures to restrict the activities and limit the profits of the corporations that displaced him.

The circumstances under which people come in contact with the public utilities are calculated to foster impatience rather than unprejudiced thought and polite speech. Most of us climb aboard the street-cars when we are in a hurry, and use the telephone when we are busy. Such conditions do not encourage conservative action when affairs do not run smoothly. As a result, the stage is set for the entrance of the demagogue, who is quick to assume the rôle of the rescuer of a downtrodden people. Says he: "The solution of all these public-service problems is merely a matter of statutes. What we need are more laws, if we would free the people from capitalistic bondage."

Fortunately, we are entering a new era—a time of clear understanding. The people have learned through bitter experience that the solution of the problem relating to our public utilities involves something more than laws, city ordinances, or court decisions. They have come to know that the public utility is linked more closely with their lives than any other form of business; that the interest of the individual citizen and the interest of the public utility are one; that the utilities are enormous consumers of fuel, steel, lumber, rubber, concrete, and the various metals; that nearly every important citizen, either directly or indirectly, is a stockholder in one or more of the utilities; that a broken-down utility can do more than all else to ruin a town; that these public-service companies must be allowed to earn enough to enable them to give satisfactory service.

Likewise, on their part, the managers of our public utilities have undergone a change of heart, and have developed a new outlook in the matter of increased responsibility and the possibilities of greater service. They understand that public ill-will and distrust have come largely as a result of their own managerial misdeeds; that insufficient or poor service is a greater cause of complaint than high rates; that the failure of utilities properly to educate employees is largely to blame for bad relations; that any company serving the public has everything to gain and nothing to lose by informing its patrons as to the cost of operation and the difficulties of business; that it is far better to have employees use their brains, in their contacts with the public, than to act always in accordance with hard and fast rules, and that nothing is more beneficial than the execution of some plan which will convert a large percentage of the customers into owners of the company's stock.

Notwithstanding the fact that the utilities enter into our lives at every turn, hardly one person in ten fully comprehends the magnitude of our American utilities and how hopeless our lives would be without them. Approximately 1,500,000 private citizens in this country have all or a part of their savings invested in the securities of electric light and power companies. The insurance companies have upward of $350,000,000 invested in these same securities, and this huge sum represents indirectly the savings of a great army of humble citizens whose hard-earned dollars represent the fruits of years of toil. Furthermore, 27,000,000 depositors, in 29,000 American banks, have a direct interest in the utilities of the United States, because of the fact that these banks have invested nearly $2,000,000,000 in utilities' securities. Thousands of the deposits in these same banks represent the inheritance and savings of widows and orphans, so it is plain that every action we take that injures our utilities at the same time destroys the security of the life savings of millions of honest people who can ill afford any material loss.

The electric light and power industry in the United States today represents a total investment of more than $5,000,000,000. It has a gross income of more than $900,000,000, and directly and indirectly furnishes employment for upward of half a million people. The industry consumes 38,000,000 tons of coal, and serves 71,000,000 people in 14,000 communities with light and power. The electrical industry consumes 13,000,000 barrels of oil annually, and is the principal customer of the producers of copper. It is the largest user of wood and coal, and the largest single buyer of pottery. Next to the automobile business, it consumes more brass than any other single line of activity. One recent survey shows that $3,225,000,000 are paid annually for service or property which could not exist unless the electric light and power companies first produced the necessary electric energy.

The electric companies are on the job twenty-four hours every day. When our homes were lighted by candles, the annual cost was about $22 for the light of five candles, five hours each night. Later, kerosene furnished 50 per cent. more light at practically the same cost. Today the average American home uses eighteen times as much light as in the old days, at an average increased cost of less than 25 per cent.

No agent that ever has come to the aid of man has lifted a greater burden from human shoulders than has electricity. It would take 20,000,000 horses to furnish the power now supplied by electrical central stations in the United States. This great number of horses would form four lines, standing head to tail, and stretching across the United States from one ocean to the other. Men and horses eat and rest between intervals of productive labor. Motors, lamps, and other electrical appliances eat only when they work. The initial cost of a one-horsepower motor is from $50 to $75, while the cost of a horse is from three to five times as much. It costs about six cents per horsepower-hour to operate a motor, while an equivalent amount of animal labor costs no less than eight cents. In the home, office, factory, or on the farm, electricity is being utilized to lessen labor and increase the joys of living. It is an indispensable agent, whether we are motoring in the country at night or having our teeth filled in town during the day. We might do without a lot of things, but electricity is not one of them.

Advocates of government or municipal ownership of utilities claim a reduction in costs due to the elimination of taxes, the abolition of dividends, the doing away with high-salaried executives, and the more economical wage and higher efficiency of labor. Under government ownership just as much money in taxes is paid, the only difference being in the distribution of the taxes. In private ownership, only the users of service pay the tax bill, while in the case of government-owned utilities, all the people pay the bill. As to the claims concerning dividends, high salaries, and more efficient labor, the answer is found in the fact that when the total operations are summed up, the people receive the power at less cost through private ownership under regulation. Such is the finding of Mr. Murray in his examination of this outstanding example of state operation of a public utility.

The investment of capital under private interest control is better protected from extravagance than when that capital is governmentally owned. In the case of government-owned utilities, the directing heads are seldom specially trained in the business under their jurisdiction. Accomplishment by individuals in control of private enterprise is subjected to keener observation than is the case when those in charge are governmental or municipal officers. Ownership of a utility by the state or city eliminates all incentive for gain, and throttles initiative. This is evidenced by the far greater growth of privately owned utilities.

The time has arrived when the public utilities and the people must get together. The utilities are the heaviest taxpayers in every populated section of the country. In the state of Ohio alone, all the public-utility companies, exclusive of steam railroads, paid $19,000,000 in taxes during the last year for which a report is available. No community can develop faster than its utilities. Therefore, regulation of these public-service corporations must be progressive and efficient rather than merely restrictive and corrective. Where the people decide to go in for municipal ownership and operation there should be the same regulation of the publicly owned plants that there is now for the privately operated utilities. The reasons for regulation are successful, says Floyd W. Parsons in World's Work. The period of business depression through which we have been passing for more than a year has been intensified and prolonged by the unsatisfactory condition in which the utilities have found themselves as a result of unfair regulation and the failure of the people to appreciate how public welfare and the welfare of the utilities are interwoven.

The general run of utilities are monopolies, and until recent times they were run by people who recognized no obligation to divulge the secrets of their business. If there is one thing the average American citizen dislikes more than anything else, it is a privately operated monopoly which affords him no opportunity of redress for his wrongs. mutual understanding, and all-round good will.—World's Work.

To California Investors: There will be on your ballot next November a proposed amendment to the Constitution of California known as the Water and Power Act and authorizing an issue of state bonds to the enormous amount of $500,000,000 bearing interest as high as 6 per cent.

The Water and Power Act would create a super-government of five persons appointed by the governor and removable only by recall or by the vote of two-thirds of both houses of the legislature. This board would have authority to issue $500,000,000 of state bonds and to invest the money as it pleased in unspecified hydro-electric ventures and in any incidental business. The act provides for the issue of bonds to pay interest as well as principal of prior issues and also to meet operating and maintenance costs of the projects to be acquired or developed.

California today has more bonds outstanding than any state except New York and Massachusetts. With $500,000,000 added to California's present debt of $75,000,000, California would have about 45 per cent. of the aggregate debt of all the states of the Union.

Bonds mean increased taxes, no matter what theorists supporting the Water and Power Act may assert to the contrary. Taxes—national, state, and local—have become a serious drag on business. What we need are proposals for reducing, not for increasing, debts and taxes.

You can help suppress the menace of the Water and Power Act by spreading correct information about it now before the scheme gains headway.

True, the scheme is preposterous, but no voter can afford to ignore it for it is an alarming menace to your welfare and to the prosperity of this state. It goes before the people with a clamor of slogans and catchwords artfully designed to conceal the real nature and consequences of the proposal.

Investors are men and women of affairs and should be informed about the Water and Power Act, which vitally concerns them. Unless the leaders in this state take the trouble to inform themselves regarding this dangerous act, demagogues are likely to do to California what the Non-Partisan League did to North Dakota.—E. H. Rollins & Sons.

Business activity has been transferred to a new field. Important gains are shown in basic industries simultaneously with a disappointing spring retail trade in many parts of the country.

The steel industry of the United States, the movement of which has been accepted for many years as a business index, has recently shown marked expansion, says the National Bank of Commerce of New York. The industry as a whole is now at 70 per cent. of capacity. Demand is well distributed throughout all classes of products, and is well sustained on the higher price levels which are being established. Important in this connection is the fact that a large proportion of the new orders reported is for railroad equipment. Pig-iron production is at the highest figure since January, 1921. The monthly rate of steel ingot production approximates that of 1913. Unfilled orders of the United States Steel Corporation on March 31st were 4,494,000 tons.

Copper is moving steadily and stocks are being gradually reduced, while producers are cautiously increasing output. There is a good demand for lead and the price has advanced slightly. The rate of consumption of tin in the plate trade is reported to be as high as for any corresponding period except during the abnormal war years. It is expected that zinc smelting operations will be increased shortly, and some expansion of mine output will naturally follow.

The manufacture of automobiles and of tires and other automobile accessories is expanding rapidly, although this is undoubtedly seasonal to a considerable degree. Retail trade in goods not designed for personal and household consumption shows improvement. The hardware business is better, not only in builders' hardware, but in the many classes of miscellaneous purchases by farmers. Agricultural implement sales have increased and there is a definite expansion in the fertilizer business, activity in both lines being in excess of even the expected seasonal demand.

The return to normal conditions is not an orderly process, and activity may shift unexpectedly from one point to another. The setback in retail trade is the direct consequence of two factors. Buying by farmers, long at a low level because of unprofitable prices for farm products, has not shown improvement, as farmers have very little money, and their buying power can not expand materially before autumn even if the current year's crops are good. They are wisely using their credit to buy fertilizer, tools, and other necessities of their business. Buying by workers in cities has declined heavily—the cumulative effect of prolonged unemployment. It now seems likely that retail trade will continue at not far from its present levels or better until the normal midsummer dullness occurs. If gains in basic industries prove permanent the autumn offers promise of expanding retail operations on a stable basis.

The progress of the nation toward normal business has not stopped; operations have merely shifted to a new field.

M. H. Lewis & Co., investment bankers, have moved their offices from the Insurance Exchange Building into larger and more conveniently arranged quarters in the California Commercial Union Building, corner Bush and Montgomery Streets. The company was organized in 1919 in Los Angeles under the name of the Frank & Lewis Company and retained that name until last September, when Mr. Lewis bought out Mr. Frank's interest. The San Francisco office is in charge of Mr. R. B. Carter, an investment banker of wide experience.

The William R. Staats Company has just completed the construction of one of the finest and most conveniently arranged banking houses in the state for their home in Pasadena. The entire building is considered a model of banking-house architecture, its thick walls and massive columns giving an atmosphere of strength and solidity. The William R. Staats Company is the pioneer bond and investment house in Pasadena, having been founded in 1887 by William R. Staats, who is now chairman of the board of directors. In October, 1905, the company opened an office in Los Angeles, and in San Francisco in October, 1911, with Mr. John W. Edminson, vice-president, as local manager. For over twenty years Mr. Edminson had been associated with N. W. Harris & Co., now known as the Harris Trust and Savings Bank of Chicago. Mr. John S. Staats, who since September, 1920, has been assistant manager of the San Francisco office, started his business career in July, 1909, in the Pasadena office. He is secretary of the company, and from the start has devoted his time to the sales end of the business. The William R. Staats Company is one of the oldest and strongest investment banking houses in the state.

American corn is apparently gaining favor with our neighbors in other parts of the world. The exports of corn, says the Trade Record of the National City Bank of New York, are now running at a rate which suggests that the fiscal year 1922 may "break the record" in the exportation of this most important of our cereal crops, and certainly in the sums of money which it brings into the country. The March exports of corn were 22,000,000 bushels against 13,000,000 in the same month of last year, and in the nine months ending with March 135,000,000 against only 36,000,000 in the same months of the preceding year, suggesting that the total for the fiscal year 1922 may perhaps surpass the banner year 1900, when the corn exports were 213,000,000 bushels, while the value of the 1921 exports is $93,000,000 against $85,000,000 in the former high record year, 1900.

Even this big total of $93,000,000 worth of corn exported in 1921 does not include that sent abroad in other forms, for the corn meal and flour exported in 1921 was about three and a half million dollars in value, and the glucose and corn sugar produced from corn aggregated six and a half million dollars in value, carrying the total export value of corn and its products in 1921 above the 100-million line, against less than ninety million dollars in the former high record year, 1900, and an average of forty-five million dollars a year in the period from 1900 to the end of 1920. This estimate of over one hundred million dollars worth of corn and its products does not attempt to include the meats, for it is our big corn crop that makes the United States the world's biggest producer and exporter of meats.

The angry feelings that rise in the heart of the consumer when he reads about wholesale meat prices being down to almost the pre-war level and considers how his local butcher is charging just about as much as ever are not entirely justified, observes a writer on the financial page of the New York Evening Post. Meat retailers are credited by this authority with trying hard to bring down their overhead so that prices will attract the consumer and also bring in a reasonable profit. In this connection certain figures on selling costs for retail meat dealers compiled by the Department of Agriculture are summarized, showing that:

"The cost of retailing meats is now about double what it was in 1913. The investigation covered thirty cities with 3505 retail meat stores. Accounts of over 400 stores for 1919-20 were fully analyzed, and supplementary studies were made for 1921. Of each dollar that the consumer spent for meat, 81.14 cents represented the wholesale price, 16.57 cents represented the cost of retailing, and 2.29 cents represented the retailer's net profit. The largest item of retailing costs was wages, amounting to 61.86 per cent. of the total. The average wages of meat-cutters increased from 32 cents per hour in 1913 to 60.7 cents in 1921. Between 1919 and 1921 there was a decline in the wholesale prices of

BOOKS ON THE TABLE.

One of the post-war epidemics has been an outburst of hitherto private chapters of history. An expectant world has waited agog for Byron's letters. "Astarte" is being republished. Letters of every other historical or semi-historical figure with a past have been unearthed wherever possible. One such memoir has just been published by the Scribners in "A Daughter of Napoleon," which is the memoirs of Emilie de Pellapra, who was known to her contemporaries and to her posterity as the Princess de Chimay. Time was—Victorian time to be sure—when such memoirs would not be considered edifying. But times change. M. Frédéric Masson of the French Academy, who writes an introduction to this diverting little volume, remarks that the lineage of the Princess de Chimay was one of the "secrets of society that every one conspired to keep." One can not help wondering why in an age that still pretends to the conventions it should not be still kept a secret. One also can not help wondering if we are to be honored with memoirs of all the other daughters of Napoleon. Why play favorites? However, there is an adequate reason for publishing the princess' memoirs, for she has given a graphic picture of her own interesting life and of the Europe of her day. Since Napoleon played no other than the initial rôle in her career and since that was not recognized in her lifetime, it seems hardly worth mentioning, let alone making it the theme and raison d'être of the book. One must remember, though, that this is a French memoir compiled by a descendant of the imperial connection and that family pride is strong. That, at least, is the explanation. It is not sufficient excuse. Family histories should be privately printed, and though the remark is not relevant to the present volume, persons who print private letters that were never meant for publication should be legislated against. In conclusion, readers and lovers of memoirs will find in "A Daughter of Napoleon" a beguiling chapter of French social history.

Of topical interest to every one concerned with Irish affairs is Francis Hackett's "The Story of the Irish Nation" (The Century Company; $2.50), which takes the history of Erin from its amorphous beginnings up to the very present of Griffith and De Valera and Collins. It is useless to pretend that Mr. Hackett's latest is not Irish propaganda. It is, in fact, deliberately labeled as patriotic propaganda and one can but admire its candor. Considering that it was written in the heat of revolution and civil war it is remarkably cool, and so far from being surprised at its moderate passion, one is surprised that it is not more passionate. Of course, it is easy to point out that a history should not be partisan. It should not. That is why it is impossible to write history. We must wait for the man from Mars if we are ever to have a dispassionate history and even then he will no doubt be biased by Martian parallax. But sophistry aside, "The Story of the Irish Nation" is not so much a serious history as a sincere attempt to plead the Irish cause to a world for the most part ignorant of the Irish past. As such it is a piece of passionate argument that one must listen to respectfully and sympathetically.

One of the outstanding novels of the past week is "Adrienne Toner" (Houghton Mifflin Company; $2), by Anne Douglas Sedgwick of "Tante" fame. Mrs. Sedgwick has not lost power in the years we have not heard from her. "Adrienne Toner" deserves not only to become a best-seller, which it probably will, but a literary catchword as it inevitably must, since there is nothing else like Adrienne in all fiction. It is not an exaggeration to say that Mrs. Sedgwick's feat in creating Adrienne is comparable to Thackeray's in producing Becky Sharp. The creation of Adrienne is equally unique, though one must admit that her execution is not equally adroit. Mrs. Sedgwick is burdened with the handicap of so many women writers—sentimentality. She got along admirably until she began to feel sorry for the tribulations she had heaped on her heroine and then began to sentimentalize about her. Such a volte face in attitude on the author's part is fatal. If he or she suffers such a change of heart the only thing left to do is rewrite. As a matter of fact it is not so much a change of feeling as a groping towards the dramatic. There is a current tendency in fiction to mask a character in a certain guise and then in the last quarter of the history to tear away the mask, revealing the hero or heroine in his proper heroic colors. Mrs. Sedgwick has done it here, and at least two other current novels, "Lilia Chenoweth" and "Saint Teresa" employed the same queer device. We do not like it. It is poor art and it is poor psychology. It smacks of cheap melodrama and detracts from whatever other merits a book may have. "Adrienne Toner" has fortunately many to counterbalance this weakness. With the exception of the noted defect, it is really an admirable piece of fiction, founded, one is sure, on fact.

Notes of Books and Authors.

An International Book Fair is scheduled to be held in Florence under the patronage of the King of Italy this month. It is heralded as the largest international book exhibit ever gotten together. The object is to promote among the nations mutual knowledge of their respective book production and to facilitate international book commerce, which is now hampered by the exchange and by the slowness and cost of transportation as well as by the exchange of translations. There is still a further object—namely, to restore by international comparisons a definite national character to the art of printing and binding. Publishers and book producers of all nations are invited to show their products. A fair within a fair will be the antiquarian section, where rare manuscripts and books will be shown. Other important exhibits will be that of the book illustrators and decorators. The fair is under the auspices of the Italian Book Publishers' Association in cooperation with the Leonardo Foundation for Italian Culture.

Mr. Arnold Bennett is about to publish a second volume of "Things That Have Interested Me."

Hitherto unpublished manuscripts of Jane Austen are shortly to be published, including a history of England.

A London paper has quoted the Chicago Daily News as saying: "It is not supposed that Margot Asquith will spoil all of Arthur Balfour's skillful work in the United States." From which we infer that the irony of the situation is not lost on England.

"Sir Wilfred Laurier's Life," by Oscar Douglas Skelton, is announced by the Oxford University Press American Branch. The volume will be read with special interest in the light of recent events in Canada, and it deals fully with the romantic side of Laurier's career. Mr. Skelton is known as the biographer of Galt.

The first five volumes of the George Moore limited edition will be published some time early in June by Boni & Liveright. This set, which is the first definitive edition of George Moore's works, will be complete, and will contain two volumes which have never been published before—called "In Single Strictness" and "Peronik the Fool, Daphnis and Chloe, etc." Mr. Moore is writing a volume to replace "Impressions and Opinions," which will be called "A Parley." The Moore books will be published in their original sequence. Almost all of them have had textual changes made in them.

Statistics for the last six months of the Modern Library are now available. They show that "Dorian Gray," "The Way of All Flesh," "Whitman's Poems," "Pepys' Diary," and "Madame Bovary" are the five most popular titles. "Treasure Island," "Soldiers Three," and, strangely enough, Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways" are the three titles in least demand.

Frank M. Chapman, the noted ornithologist, has found that bird migrations are heaviest during the early weeks of May, reaching a peak about the 10th of the month. Hence now is the time when all bird lovers are keenly counting up the number of species

REVIEWS AND NOTICES.

The Girl from Montana.

A new novel by the popular author of "Marchia Schuyler" is "The Girl from Montana," a story in which Mrs. Hill has ample opportunity to exercise her gift for the portraiture of young girls. The plot is the typical Western one of a gallant tenderfoot, a Montana "bad man," a lone girl, cut off from civilization and three thousand miles from friends—all the blood and thunder, in short, of the typical Western thriller. What makes "The Girl from Montana" different from its fellows is Mrs. Hill's dainty style, which is, however, better fitted to the old-fashioned romances of her earlier manner, and her gift for characterization.

The New Heavens

Dr. Hale, director of the Mount Wilson Observatory of the Carnegie Institute at Washington, has conferred a favor on the public by writing "The New Heavens." Astronomers of his "magnitude" are usually too absorbed in the heavens to know there is a reading public that is not equally absorbed, but that would like to know something of the all-engrossing subject. Some years ago Dr. Hale came to the rescue of the astronomically benighted with "The Study of Stellar Evolution." This volume, which was an untechnical account of modern astrophysical research, is now out of print and has become in the fourteen years since its appearance out of date. Dr. Hale had no time to rewrite nor to publish a revised edition, but from time to time he contributed articles to Scribner's Magazine, which he has now collected in "The New Heavens." One of the necessary features of an astronomical treatise are the illustrations, and in order to present them as clearly as possible astronomies are usually printed on the best of papers. "The New Heavens," which is admirable in this respect, is therefore a very attractive book, as well as a very useful one to the well-informed person who wishes to be better informed.

The Story of Drugs.

Henry C. Fuller has written his "The Story of Drugs" on the theory that the average intelligent man and woman has grown impatient at the mystery that has been made for centuries about the nature of materia medica. He tells in the approved popular style of a handbook for laymen what drugs are, their sources—whether animal, vegetable, or mineral, of the beginnings and accomplishments of the drug industry, and how medicines are made. His discussion of the medical rôle of alcohol will surprise many lay readers. The general field of vaccine and serum therapy, which has been so recently explored, is made clear to the unprofessional reader. An interesting chapter on vitamins is entitled "The Spirit World of Medicine." Among practical features is a plan for an adequate domestic medicine chest; but the book is not to be mistaken for a home medicine book. Its subject is drugs and not ills. Mr. Fuller's technicalities are made very clear and very readable and his book is well calculated to enlarge the information of practically every one.

"The Story of Drugs" was suggested to its author by innumerable questions put to him by acquaintances, many of them professional chemists and physicians, but all of whom had something to learn on the subject of drugs. Mr. Fuller has been engaged in chemical research for years. He has been associated with Dr. Wiley and "the Pure Food law" and with the Institute of Industrial Research, Washington, D. C.

Psychic Research.

The latest discovery in spiritistic matters is that spirits are not spirits, as one-half of the world, called gullible by the other incredulous though anxious half, formerly believed. A French scientist has declared so-called psychic manifestations as not at all necessarily supernatural. These phenomena that superstitious and ignorant man has relegated to the realm of the mystical since his savage infancy are, according to latest research, simply a less concrete form of physical science that would have been discovered and explored long ago but for the superstition and quackery that has surrounded it. It is still problematical whether it is of any practical value now that it is being exploited, but presumably no realm of knowledge should be neglected.

Probably the most scientific book up to date in English on psychic manifestations is "The Psychic Structures at the Goligher Circle." To those versed in older psychic research this title may mean something. To the outsider, it unfortunately means nothing, and one must overcome one's native dislike for the subject in order to find out. The author is W. J. Crawford, late lecturer in mechanical engineering at Queen's University at Belfast. The reader is slightly reassured by the concrete and mundane calling of the author of this book on psychic research, the gist of which is that psychism can be subjected to precise scientific treatment and that the manifestations which men have jeered at or been awed by for countless centuries are really a sort of fourth-dimensional quality or sense that some people have—that perhaps every one has—and which consists in the auto-kinetic power of something tangible and ponderable to separate itself from its possessive body and flit about doing things quite on its own. The old faithful will probably call this self-willed flitter—which Dr. Crawford calls "plasma"—spirit or soul or embodied will. But the proof of the pudding is in the eating and the proof of a spirit should be in its invisibility. If a spirit is not phereal, what in the world is it? The real scientific contribution of this book is that so-called spiritistic phenomena are really an unexplored field of material phenomena. "There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Our Pear-Shaped Globe.

While Dowie insisted that the earth was flat, and his successor, Voliva, sticks to the same opinion, serious scientists now begin to hark back to the theory which Columbus formulated on his third voyage, that the earth is shaped somewhat like a pear.

The eminent geologist Sollas affirms that if the earth is tending to become round, it has not yet become so. It even appears that what is today the moon belonged originally to the stem end of the terrestrial pear, which in the course of violent rotation threw it off.

This, says the Petit Parisien, is a theory. It is perhaps as good as any other, but anyway it is well not to get excited over it. Men were just as well off when they believed that the earth was flat and did not suspect the existence of antipodes.

The First War Book.

Mr. St. Loe Strachey describes in the Nineteenth Century the first book on war ever written. It was the work of a Chinaman, Sun Tzu:

"The book was, until quite recently, the recognized text-book on the art of war for modern Chinese students of strategy—yet this slated-pattern military classic of China was written by Sun Tzu a generation before Aristotle!"

Who was Sun Tzu?

"I think I can best explain the kind of man that Sun Tzu was by calling him the first staff college professor ever let loose upon a wondering world. We do not know a great deal about Sun Tzu's life and work, except that he was very masterful, very opinionative, in fact a thorough-going schoolmaster, and that the kings and dukes and statesmen whom he influenced seem to have been thoroughly dominated by his powerful will. Indeed, he appears to have practiced upon them the first principle of the art of war. As will be remembered, war has been described as 'making your will prevail over that of the enemy.'"

The book is not a great work, but rather a statement of ideas and facts.

Is it, then, true that "at no time in our literary history was the English public, as represented by its critics and leaders of taste, less qualified to admire and celebrate William Shakespeare"? Is it true that never before has his fame been "so low or so confused"? My own answer would be that never before have Shakespeare's critics been so generally enlightened, his essential potencies so clearly felt, his fame so secure, and his contemporaneity so obvious, says Karl Young in the North American Review. And this good fortune arises in large measure, I think, from the fact that in these times readers of his plays are more directly fixing their attention where Shakespeare certainly fixed his. If we are losing interest in those vexed inquiries as to when Macbeth first conceived the murder, why Emilia was silent about the handkerchief, and why Hamlet pretended madness, we are the more direct and ardent in our attention to Macbeth, Desdemona, and Hamlet themselves.

The elephant is not the zoological Methusalem he is often said to be; he lives about 100 years.

THE MILLER-BATES PREMIERE.

An array of pleased smiles, a constant ripple of laughter, greeted the steady flow of witty sallies that made us enjoy "Her Friend the King" in spite of its faults. The play is a sentimental comedy, rather reminiscent of Captain Marshall's "The Royal Family," which had a big vogue all over the country, oh, æons and æons ago. There wasn't an American widow in that play, which pre-dated the era when American millionaire widows, herbageous or otherwise, calmly and with the utmost sang froid debate within themselves, as they successfully storm the social barriers hitherto so impregnable in shielding royalty, whether or not they would do well matrimonially to annex a princelet; or even a kingleit.

But in "The Royal Family" there was the same incognito romance helped on between the two young royalties. Otherwise, except for the public's privilege of being admitted on terms of intimacy, in both plays, with such loftily placed personages, one comedy does not resemble the other.

"Her Friend the King" is really in process of a try-out here in San Francisco, and I do not doubt that it will be subjected to some excisions. Greater brevity in the third and fourth acts would improve it. It is also a grave error to cause the prince so thoroughly to transfer his allegiance to the widow. It would be much better to have him do what we in the audience believed, at first, that he really was doing: make a pretense of falling in love with the widow, in order to provoke Princess Lydia, who might hang back a little, to a warmer response. At any rate even sophisticated theatre-goers feel their susceptibilities toward the engaging young prince somewhat huffed by his inconstancy.

The situation arose from the old romantic tendency of authors to shower triumphs on an irresistible heroine, such as Mrs. Hastings is supposed to be. But Mrs. Hastings' archness and charm are sufficiently established without going to such lengths as running the danger of antagonizing the spectator's sympathy.

The plot of "Her Friend the King" is plainly perceived to be rather attenuated, and melodrama is invoked to run it out to due lengths; although it reaches slightly undue lengths. However, in a play of this kind, which is palpably written merely for light entertainment, we accept the melodrama as part of it, and, knowing that Europe seethes at all times, but particularly since the war, with murderous conspiracy, are not quarreling at all at the element of seriousness that is suddenly injected into the smiling King George's operatically involved affairs.

The really most commendable element in the piece is the way the dialogue has been handled. The various personages converse characteristically. Whether princesses can become as free, natural, and spontaneous as does Lydia after her declaration of independence, whether kings, surrounded by courtiers and deception, can be as clear-sighted and humorously perspicacious as King George, we do not know, not being accustomed, like American multi-millionaires, easily to invite royalty to stay to lunch. But we enjoyed Lydia's and her father's new understanding, Lydia's youthful revolts against the harness of state policy that cramps the tender limbs of princesses, the dry yet genial and ever-ready sallies of the king, and the quick and characteristically American humor in the responses of the widow. And the prince was a nice, well-bred blonde boy with the British accent common to all the sprigs of royalty on the Continent when they speak English.

Mr. Miller, as usual, treated us well in respect to the company he brought with him. I think his New York confrères in the producing business must have felt very covetous when he went from these shores after his last season here loaded to the gunwales with boodle amounting to nearly eighty thousand dollars. Mr. Miller is an excellent business man, and I do not doubt that he returns the most constant and friendly sentiments entertained toward him by our community. But business is business. He evidently said to himself, "Catch me staying in the effete East when they like Blanche Bates and me so much in California." So he rustled around, gathered a good company together, and came back at his earliest convenience.

Also, being well aware that Ruth Chatterton and Bruce McRae are quite solid with Californians, he takes no risks with other players, but holds them in reserve for the next play, "The Awful Truth," by Arthur Richman.

Although "Her Friend the King" is dramatized from a novel called "High Life," written by Harrison Rhodes, it bears all the marks of having been done to order with Henry Miller and Blanche Bates in mind for the two chief personages. Hence these two players make a most agreeable impression in their respective rôles, which present them, in spite of King George's royal background, in, on the whole, rather a familiar light.

Blanche Bates, by the way, lived thoroughly up to her rôle in the matter of costumes. Her clothes are fairly thrilling, and oh, girls, any quantities of changes. She carried them very smartly, too. I am much of the opinion that as, since her last visit here, she has become appreciably slender, she has been having herself planed down in preparation for this rôle, which demands that she be the last word in smartness and style.

Annette Westbay, when the princess shed her dull cocoon and emerged as a butterfly, contrived, whether intentionally or not I know not, to strike a decidedly foreign note in her progressively radiant costumes, which very aptly made the necessary contrast to the widow's up-to-dateness, and yet appreciably held their own. Annette Westbay is new to us; but then she must be comparatively new to the stage, as she is very young. She is a slender, girlish little creature with marked features to which a few years will, perhaps, lend a too early maturity. But at present she is a very attractive ingénue. Her most noticeable asset in the beauty line aside from her childlike slenderness, is a head of beautiful hair and a pair of unusually large and beautiful eyes, which, however, she uses too consciously. A little more experience in life will teach the young thing that a woman should never exert any of her charms too consciously.

Perhaps the coquetties of the widow are slightly overstressed. But this is due, no doubt, to Blanche Bates being called on to fill the rôle of a woman who is, on the whole, almost too romantically irresistible.

Geoffrey Kerr is very much at home in the rôle of the prince; so much so that we willingly accept him as the type of the young, well-bred prince of the present day who is inconvenienced with opinions and disposed to play a hand in his own destiny.

A. E. Thomas, no doubt, is the one of the two collaborators—Harrison Rhodes being the other—who understands so well the art of quick, easy repartee, which shows, in King George's case, a knowledge of life and a shrewdly satiric perception of its inconsistencies and insincerities. And as he made all the personages of the play speak in character, so Bidgerton, governess to the princess, remains delightfully mid-Victorian throughout the play. The rôle was excellently played by Marguerite St. John, who showed consistency and an underlying, carefully restrained sense of humor in her depiction of Bidgerton's tearful rebellion against twentieth-century iconoclasm.

The actors—Messrs. Andrews, Harvey, and Willard—who represented the men in the king's suite were more than acceptable in the rôles to which their appearance was well suited, and Mr. Miller, experienced manager that he is, had contrived to evolve an atmosphere suitable to the respect without obsequiousness which would naturally surround even as easy-going but essentially royal—modern royal—a king as this George of Constantia.

SHAKESPEAREAN DRAMA.

The engagement of Walter Hampden, just concluded in San Francisco, was the means of bringing to local attention the actor who, during the next decade or so, is to uphold the Shakespearean tradition. The Sothern-Marlowe pair, having previously retired from the stage for a time, may be said to have but partly returned to it, as they indulge themselves with long vacations. Robert Mantell, who in any case is limited in range and without real distinction, is apparently getting ready to feature his wife, and that means, probably, that he sees retirement a few years away. Keller, who is an experienced and capable if not inspired player, does not seem able to harness up with a good business manager, and remains comparatively obscure; without prestige or fame.

In any case, none of these men are really inspired tragedians. All capable, two of them, at least, sufficiently careful students of the Shakespearean tradition to present their own share in the plays with dignity and with scholarly authority, no one of them has wholly succeeded in meeting the exactions of the more discriminating lovers of the Shakespearean drama. Of the three Sothern comes nearest to it. But he has, or used to have, romantic charm—which the others certainly lack—lays out more money on his productions than Mantell, has much better support, and is fortunate enough to have a famous wife of rare quality in her depiction of the Shakespearean heroines. Besides, he can, better than either of the other two men, give the illusion of comparative youth.

Walter Hampden has the advantage of all three of them in respect to years. A man of physically fine appearance, he has height, a graceful figure, and a handsome countenance. He can appeal to the exactions of an æsthetic taste and to the sense of poetic fitness because of the grace, charm, and distinction of his appearance. He is able to separate himself from all modernness of suggestion by the mediæval picturesqueness of appearance that he accomplishes; and he is fortunate indeed in the possession of a beautiful voice full of warmth of tone, and flexible and free in the variety of its intonation.

It is plain that this actor leaves nothing to chance. Some of his attitudes, notably that which he makes the dying Othello assume by the death-bed of his tragically isolated love, are the result of a careful study of famous paintings; and his fine voice has been systematically trained and developed. Also his acting is full of minute detail which notably aids in conveying the subjective suggestion. A good illustration of this may be remembered in the treatment of the hands, in "Othello," which, when the Moor was caught in the flood-tide of agony, shared in the expression of the emotions indicated in the convulsed countenance. Also the player by a subtlety of technique which it is difficult to grasp, so delicately is it employed, makes the spectator aware of Othello's perception, even when jealousy is tearing him cruelly, that this is a snowy lily, or a fine and precious pearl, that has chosen to bestow its sovereign and delicate beauty on his dark bosom.

Mr. Hampden gave a very intelligent portrayal of Macbeth, but his Othello touched greatness. As yet he shows unevenness in his work. In that comparatively tranquil moment in the drama when Othello, serene in the knowledge that without magic or guile he has won the lovely Desdemona for his own, exculpates himself before the tribunal, the actor did not entirely succeed in pouring a flood of calm, poetic beauty over the scene. There was a falling off in the spectator's rising tide of profound gratification which was destined, however, to reach its full flood later.

For, in the long and trying handkerchief scene, Mr. Hampden thrilled his audience into a profoundly moving recognition of the imminent tragedy that was impending through craft and wickedness working on a noble soul unarmed against such base weapons. So that, as the tragedy darkly lowered, an inner voice seemed to repeat Othello's own words, "But yet the pity of it! O, the pity of it!"

But again, in that magnificent passage beginning

It is the cause, it is the cause, my soul,—
Let me not name it to you, you chaste stars!—
It is the cause . . .

the player's muse again faltered. It is evident that, in this rôle at least, he excels particularly in the delineation of the Moor in his moments of supreme emotion. For, at such times, the actor approximated real greatness.

Mr. Hampden's countenance is so expressive of the storms that sweep over Othello's tortured soul that it is cause for wonder that the stage is kept so nearly dark. The actor, in physical representation, presents a beautiful Othello, well worth looking at. An audience dislikes a prolonged darkened stage, and this one wished, besides, to see more clearly features that were so graphically conveying the Moor's emotions. Similar conditions also bothered Mr. Hampden's earnest admirers during the performance of "Macbeth."

The members of the company, although it was composed of unknown players, were so noticeably intelligent in their reading of the Shakespearean verse—which is becoming rather a rare accomplishment—and the general delivery of the lines was so distinct and even musical, that it is evident the standard which Mr. Hampden places so high in this regard for his own case is extended to his fellow artists. It is probable, indeed, that he has given them helpful instructions and illustrations, during rehearsals, in order to obtain such markedly good results.

Without any particular indications of having made a sensational success, this two weeks of Shakespeare has attracted good houses. On Saturday night the tragedian made a brief speech of thanks for the appreciation shown, and inferentially held out a hope of return; and as there are many failures in the theatres during these hard times, it is probable that this hope will materialize.

Mr. Hampden won the young generation during his engagement here. Some of the old standbys that always dig themselves out from their arm-chairs when Will Shakespeare comes to town were there, but if the eye traveled over the rows of heads in the auditorium it was noticeable that the great majority were the ungrizzled heads of youth. For young play-goers were quick to recognize that a player of graceful appearance, of romantic charm, and of tragic power was here, to embody for them their hitherto unincarnated conceptions of characters that still hold their seemingly immortal supremacy in the realm of dramatic representation.

"WILD BIRDS."

It took the president of the University of California, and a few sensible words from him, to establish the fact that the prize play, "Wild Birds," is not a corruptor of morals. The play has not the quality of inevitability, and therefore can not teach with entire success the lesson of gentleness to the ignorantly erring that its author seeks to convey. But neither does it make any impure or debasing suggestions whatsoever. Its status is that of a homely drama, very meritoriously done in a series of scenes in which the gradual progression of the culminating tragedy is well indicated. And while it will not win any sensational success for its author, it shows that

In Line with Our Forward Movement

San Francisco and Spring Valley, working together under the terms of an order of the Railroad Commission, have swung your water supply into line with the City's Forward Movement.

Here, briefly, is the new note in civic development:

San Francisco, at the earliest possible date, is to have 24 million gallons of water added to its daily supply. The total yield will be 66 million gallons daily.

The additional water will be brought into service through a co-operative arrangement between the City and the Water Company.

Spring Valley will raise Calaveras Dam in the Alameda part of the system, storing there four times as much water as at present; will enlarge its conduit facilities in Niles Canyon, and extend them to Irvington.

The City will build that part of the Hetch Hetchy conduit that extends from Irvington, Alameda County, to Crystal Springs, San Mateo County.

The additional 24 million gallons daily will be carried to Irvington, and the Bay Division of the Hetch Hetchy conduit will be utilized to bring the water from Irvington to Crystal Springs storage reservoir.

The Company's cooperation in this plan was made possible by a decision of the Railroad Commission which requires the Company to pay interest during construction on the cost of the City's conduit, some $250,000 per annum for the use of the conduit, the increased operating expenses inseparable from the enlargement of the supply, and yearly contributions to an amortization fund (providing for the new capital expenditures) that will go to the City if the Company's properties are purchased within twelve years.

Abundant water for the ever-increasing needs of our growing City! Surely this is a substantial contribution to the Forward Movement.

SPRING VALLEY

he has sufficient ability in his chosen profession to make it worth his while to go on striving; for this is an era in which, when success in play-writing is attained, the rewards are great and overwhelming.

And there are helpful conclusions to be derived from the play, one of which that it is an awful indictment of just the ordinary citizen—man or woman—that no better way in this our boasted civilization has yet been formulated for the punishment of delinquent youth than to imprison it in a place which virtually is a den of corruption.

Perhaps if this play were acted before farming circles the cold and cruel-hearted ones might perceive themselves as others see them; although it is more easy and comfortable to believe, as probably is the case, that the majority of farm employers are more social and human than are the Slags.

But the author had a case to make, and although he was rather extreme in the presentation of it, still he succeeded in evolving an interesting, well-planned, well-written, and moving play.

"Wild Birds" has weathered the storm that threatened it, and will be again acted by the same talented and carefully trained company Thursday evenings.

Some of the cast—perhaps all of them—are students at the university and therefore can not appear every night. It probably is a cause for amazement to these young people that a lone policeman, however honest, worthy, and well-meaning, should have delegated to him the task of deciding upon the qualifications or disqualifications of a piece to convey immoral suggestions. But the same citizens that allow reform schools to remain unreformed allow lone policemen to be censors. And while this entirely unobjectionable play was being condemned, a coarsely suggestive bedroom farce was being played here, while a few weeks ago a local picture-play so horrified by its rankness many people that went to see it that they warned off a lot of others.

The most edifying thing in the whole incident is the perfectly commendable attitude of the policeman—I don't mean his judgment, by the way, I mean his point of view. He doesn't believe in allowing pieces to go on the boards that corrupt the public morals. Neither do you, nor I. But apparently any citizen has but to complain to the police department that a theatrical piece is immoral, whereupon a conscientious and serenely courageous officer is detailed to pass upon the piece; in other words to be a censor.

I read a very good article about censorship by the well-known novelist, Katherine Fullerton Gerould, from which I really must quote.

"Censorship," she says, "as practiced in modern societies, serves neither morals nor art. Censors are never—even when they are not appointed for obscure political reasons—fit for their job. No one who is fit for the job is ever willing to be a censor. . . . Censorship, properly managed, demands an immense store of knowledge, long experience of literature and art, extremely wise judgment, entire lack of prejudice, and a profound acquaintance with human psychology."

So there you are. Wake up, gentlemen of the police force, and let us see which one can fill the bill.

JOSEPHINE HART PHELPS.

The Figaro tells of an English sailor named Mitchell who was a past master at the art of tasting whisky. In the war he was asphyxiated and lost his sense of smell and the use of speech. Deprived of his calling, he became a boxer. Now, in a certain bout in London Mitchell received a formidable blow under his nose and another on his jaw. Ten seconds later he was knocked out. One of his attendants rushed some spirits to him. Then Mitchell miraculously recovered and declared, even before wetting his lips, "This stuff is at least fifteen years old."

FOYER AND BOX-OFFICE.

The Columbia Theatre.

The second production of the Henry Miller season will bring forth Ruth Chatterton as the star in a new comedy by Arthur Richman, "The Awful Truth." Mr. Richman will be remembered for his "Ambush," yet to be seen in San Francisco, but available in book form. In this new comedy Miss Chatterton will have the support of a distinguished cast headed by the popular Bruce McRae, last seen here in Miss Chatterton's support in "Come Out of the Kitchen."

The Orpheum Next Week.

Anita Peters Wright is a Californian and her artistic work in creating dance features for the different productions in the Greek Theatre at Berkeley has made her well known throughout the country. All of the Wright dancers are artists. In their present vaudeville act they offer "The Dance Voyage," in which a young naval officer tells, with verse and song, of the different countries he has visited and the different girls who have interested him.

Until recently Laura Pierpont has co-starred with Taylor Granville. Now Miss Pierpont has become a star in her own right. Every effort has been exercised to give her the best of everything. Edgar Allan Woolf was commissioned to write the play; Mr. Granville engaged her supporting company and staged the play for her, the result being that "The Guiding Star" permits Miss Pierpont to appear in four distinct and widely different characters.

Every vaudeville patron will remember debonair Charles Olcott, who amused with the inimitable musical skit called "The One Man Opera." Likewise Mary Ann, who presented a series of song numbers. The offering they bring, under the billing of "Just Charlie and May in Charlie's Songs," has met with merited recognition.

Emerson and Baldwin started out in the theatrical world to be jugglers, but found themselves to be even more skillful comedians, so they now offer a satire which is very funny and which they aptly term "What Fools These Mortals Be."

"The Wonder Girl" stages her specialty in a unique manner and in every way gives her act the aspect of novelty. Between her feats she talks brightly, humorously, and pertinently.

David Schooler and his charming assistants, the Minstrel Monarchs, and James Doyle and Evelyn Cavanaugh remain for a second week.

"Sorcerer" Still Charms.

"The Sorcerer" is continuing at the Players Theatre through this month on Friday and Saturday evenings. The piece goes with the utmost smoothness, the performers, who were good from the beginning, having acquired a higher polish from the repeated performances. The tunefulness of the opera, the quality of the company's conveyance of the Gilbertian humor, and the freshness and beauty of the voices have united to form a combination worthy of experienced professionals, and enthusiastic adherents of the old Gilbert and Sullivan pieces can not well afford to miss seeing "The Sorcerer."

Several Recitals.

The second of the Alice Seckels Salon Series at the Del Monte Hotel will be a recital by the Hungarian contralto, Mme. Ruzena Spratti, to be given May 6th. The first of this series, on April 20th, with Mrs. Henry Lund, Jr., in a recital of impersonations, was warmly received by a very appreciative audience, who testified extreme enjoyment of a well-balanced programme varying from humor to dramatically emotional expression by the gifted diseuse.

Miss Clara Alexander, who confines her line of impersonations largely to humorous delineations of darky characters, has greatly pleased all of her hearers, notably Southern people who are familiar with darky character and darky speech, in the recital she gave at the St. Francis.

The Krupp workers insist on working eight hours continuously except for one fifteen-minute pause, and beginning work at 6 o'clock in the morning, so that they finish the day's work at quarter past 2 in the afternoon, says a dispatch to the New York Times. This gives the workers practically all afternoon, as well as the evening, for dissipation, pleasure, loafing, or wage-earning work. As a result most of the workers show up at 6 o'clock in the morning tired. It takes several hours before they begin to hit their working stride. And taking no adequate lunch and rest period, they begin to slacken their pace several hours before quitting time. This fatigue factor is scientifically proved by a graphic chart of the works' electricity consumption, which shows a rise during the first two hours to the peak and a sharp drop during the last two hours. Yet the workers can't be weaned from their self-chosen fatigue schedule of the eight-hour union day. The present average production efficiency of the Krupp works looks about 30 per cent. below American par.

MORE ROMAN EXCAVATIONS.

A most interesting relic of Roman London has been discovered beneath one of the city's busiest highways, according to the London Daily Telegraph. In the centre of Gracechurch Street, a little south of the Cornhill crossing, excavations have disclosed the lower courses of a Roman building which, from the fragment visible, was evidently of some importance. The Postoffice Department is burrowing the length of Gracechurch Street for the purpose of laying telephone cables. The trench now being cut is partly open and partly tunneled, and as it progressed pick and spade, working in the deep sub-soil, found an obstruction in a stout and hard wall.

The depth reached is about thirteen feet—that at which the buried Roman city is often met, though at times the pick has to go deeper. A clearance having been made of the face of the wall, it is found to be covered with plaster, which had been painted. Behind the wall is composed of ragstone and the characteristic Roman bonding tile of burnt clay of a bright red color, its thickness being 2 feet 9 inches. A length of about ten feet of this wall has been disclosed, following the central line of Gracechurch Street. At right angles is a more massive wall 4 feet 6 inches in thickness, little of which has been opened up in the exceedingly narrow trench.

The presence of colored plaster upon this wall face indicates that this is an inner chamber, either of a public building or of the residence of a Roman citizen of importance long centuries ago. A puzzling feature of the find is that the lower part of the chamber appears to have been filled up—and in Roman times—for at a depth of only eight feet six inches from the ground surface a pavement of red tesserae was alighted upon. This was fragmentary, but covered a good deal of expanse of the trench, resting upon a carefully prepared bed laid on the original floor. First came beaten earth, then earth mixed with mortar, next a layer of loose ragstones and last dressed red mortar, in which the tesserae were bedded.

With little doubt the preservation of the plaster on the face of the wall has been due to this filling above the original floor. The plaster still retained the lower part of square panels painted in black outline, with a simple ornament around, and the painted plaster gave the impression that it had been colored in imitation of marble. Mr. Lambert, F. S. A., of the Guildhall Museum staff, has carefully watched the progress of the excavations, but it has not been found possible to remove the plaster in any substantial pieces, and, apart from the tesserae, there is nothing in this Roman find that can be salvaged. The trench will be again filled.

Close at hand is Leadenhall. When the present market was constructed excavation of the ground disclosed extensive remains of an important Roman building. This, from its position and expanse, the late Sir Laurence Gomme considered was likely to have been the Forum of the Roman city. It is probable that the remains now unearthed are associated with the same group of buildings.

The discovery has another interest. Gracechurch Street is very old. The presence of the Roman building right in the middle of the highway proves conclusively that the mediaeval street did not follow the line of the Roman street. Thereby it administers one more knock to the theory—it has received many hard knocks of late—that London of today has come down in unbroken descent and history from the London of the Romans. The dark centuries still remain dark.

Radio Transmission.

The equipment of a radio transmitting station comprises: a source of power, a means for converting this power into high-frequency electric currents, and an antenna, says Stuart Ballantine in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. The function of the antenna is to radiate or to produce the electric waves, and in order to do this efficiently takes the form of one or more elevated wires. Once produced, the waves spread out in all directions with the speed of light.

During our school days we learned that an electric current flowing through a wire affected a magnetic compass needle held close to it and caused the needle to move when the current was turned on or interrupted. This movement of the needle was said to be the result of a "magnetic force" set up by the current, and by this simple experiment the relation between electricity and magnetism was demonstrated.

Now the transmitting antenna carries electric currents which reverse their direction or "alternate" a large number of times per second; in the case of the broadcasting stations with 360-meter wave length this happens at the rate of about a million each second. Each time the current, let us say, starts up the antenna from the ground a magnetic field is set up around it, and each time it reverses and starts back again this field tries to collapse on the wire and be reestablished in the opposite direction. If the action takes place at a sufficiently rapid rate the magnetic field does not have time to collapse completely back on the wire before the reversed field starts out; the result is that the field moves away from the antenna in the form of an electric wave. This explanation is very crude, but very large and very mathematical books have been written on this process, and in this brief space all the details can not be considered. The important thing is that the rapidly alternating currents in the antenna produce electric and magnetic fields which move away from it with the speed of light.

Let us look at the other side of the picture. When these waves strike an antenna properly attuned to them, the action is reversed, and they produce therein electric currents of the same type as the original currents in the transmitting antenna, but of greatly diminished intensity. Thus from one point of view, the antenna of the radio telephone (or telegraph) station may be looked upon as the intermediate agent between the instruments and the ether. It is like a hand stretched up into the invisible medium of transmission; in one case to throw the waves out into space, and in the other to catch them and bring them into the receiving station, where they are translated by the instruments into intelligible sounds.

Steam was first applied to industrial purposes about 1750.

VANITY FAIR.

We have been treated within the week to the spectacle of an Irish police chief enforcing English hypocrisy in an American city. It is a thoroughly enjoyable spectacle because it has no moral. The act of Chief O'Brien, following the recommendation of a patrolman, in taking a naughty word out of a play and substituting a respectable one meaning the same thing, a thoroughly English way of curing an abuse, will appeal as most entertaining to those persons of a cast of mind to share Lord North's liking for the Order of the Garter "because it has none of this demned merit about it"; the chief's act has no sense about it, and so it supports previous conclusions about the sagacity of policemen and the wisdom of having our lives directed by the government. The writer is not prepared to pass judgment on the play because he has not seen it. He has only read notices of it, and having reached the time of life when his daily prayer is to be protected from wild bores has had no inclination to run after wild birds. According to the press notices and so-called reviews, we suppose "Wild Birds" to be one of those plays wherein white is black, immorality is really morality, and a man who feels outraged because his family has been disgraced and his home defiled by a couple of little human animals he had sheltered and fed is really a villain and a brute for taking any interest in the matter. A play can be made that way, but thank Heaven attendance at it is not compulsory. A considerable number of people appear to like it. If they do, they ought to have it whole. Chief O'Brien and his patrolman do not seem to think so, and herein they differ from President Barrows of the university—to the extent of at least one plain and effective old Low Dutch water-front word. Well, chacun à son métier. President Barrows knows what is good for the university, and perhaps Chief O'Brien knows what is good for the literati. It is to be hoped that having become a collaborator in playwriting with Dan Tothoroh the chief will some day give us a play of his own. He ought to have more material than Tothoroh, because he has officially seen more of the muck some persons call "life," and should be able to produce something with an even worse stench. It is merely a matter of marketing the stuff. He could be his own censor, and by leaving out all the naughty words and putting in synonyms that were accustomed to traveling in good company he should be able to produce something thoroughly putrescent and acceptable to the most eminent sex faddists of the day.

This inversion of the moral code, by the way, this sex fad now running through a large part of our literature and some mixed conversation, these tentative starts at rejecting conventional restraints approved by the experience of centuries as conserving and necessary, at removing all the landmarks of the law, at bringing humanity out of its terrible pietistic dungeons into the "larger freedom," where everybody is to be permitted to do just as he or she pleases, and even urged to, and in time perhaps compelled to—these irritants are related not so much to the war and the crime wave as they are to a peculiar brand of pink socialism that has become the vogue of certain yearning natures. They have recognized, or somebody else has recognized for them, that the home is an obstacle to the regeneration of humanity on the socialistic basis; that if men are to have families that are definite and children they are sure belong to them, they will wish to accumulate private property and defend it against collectivistic confiscation. They will even wish to leave that property, when they die, to those children, and they will take an interest in maintaining the laws and institutions that enable them to do these anti-social things. Hence the horrible nature of the family, and the vice of having legitimate offspring. It is true that not all socialists so believe and feel. Some, we understand, are quite kind husbands and fathers, and we know one that is even a good neighbor. It is not possible to accuse socialism, as a whole, of this thing, any more than Burke could indict a whole people, so varied has this vagary become, so "empty, vast, and wandering" are its troubled waters. But there is in its peculiar dissatisfaction and its easy and obvious logic basis for this sort of sentiment, and disposition to let the tail go with the hide, as they used to say in Missouri. And that's fair, too. What needs to be recognized is that there is hardly room for socialism in the same bed with sensible, moral, well-ordered life. The knees of one or the other party are just bound to stick out into the cold.

Having our drama rewritten by our police department, however, is hardly a cure. It is too much the way real socialism would operate.

Amid all this revamping of the ideals of womanhood, this turning over of the conceptions of what sort of person woman ought to be, this acute and apparently painful woman-consciousness, it is comforting to learn of one that forgot all about it in her hour of stress and did just what woman used to do before she was conscious that she had a higher sphere to fill and must make extra efforts to fill it by doing something queer. A burglar entered a Berkeley boarding-house the other night looking for something besides his board, and wandered into the landlady's room. That is where he made a mistake. Never enter a landlady's room, especially if her name is Callahan. He awakened her, and she just sat up in bed and began to scream, nothing more modern than that. In jumping through a wire screen and running like the devil the burglar undoubtedly responded to the stimulus automatically. There is no doubt that his part of the act was cave-man stuff; with this slight difference, that whereas the cave man could shut off the screams by choking his female, the poor burglar didn't have time, and so he beat it; across the back yard and over the fence, with our old friend Monacle Jordan in hot pursuit and a whole pajama rally streaming after. No man will willingly hear a woman scream. If he can't stop hearing it any other way he will go somewhere else, and he will go there very fast. The reporters played it up as a case of heroism, whereas it was merely a case of feminism. But it was real feminism, not club life.

The Chronicle some weeks since made a very damaging exposé of one of the frauds of spiritualism. One of its reporters caught, and held, and exposed a young girl who was being used as a materialized spirit. It is not the first, nor the hundredth time that this most transparent and abominable of shams has been exploded by the actual detection of the persons engaged in its criminal practices. We are not unfortunate enough to have a personal acquaintance with any of the charlatans engaged in this business; and if any of our acquaintances are stupid enough to believe in "spiritualism," they pay us the compliment of not acknowledging the fact to us. If there is anybody in this world who thinks they can get a glimpse over the threshold of the next, or obtain any information from beyond the grave, or receive any communication from the dead, they may not endeavor to convince us of the error of disbelief. We are not in the frame of mind to be convinced, we are not in the mental condition of inquiry. We divide spiritualists into two classes—knaves and fools. Charlatanism, humbuggery, and superstition characterize the whole business. None but the ignorant can ever be imposed upon by spiritualism.

The preceding paragraph was not written yesterday nor last week. It was written by Frank M. Pixley and published in the Argonaut of January 17, 1885. Evidently, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle was not reading the Argonaut at that time, and so escaped instruction in this vital matter. Could the spirit of Frank M. Pixley return it would probably take pleasure in classifying Sir Arthur, Sir Oliver, Sir William, and all the other spook-haunted knights. It would also be amused to see that the old game goes right on and is just as lucrative as it was in its day on earth. Yet if it could return, it would disprove its own thesis. Perhaps it would deny that it had returned; some people are so skeptical.

The question presents itself whether three stars of the constellation of the Pleiades have less brilliancy than formerly, or whether prehistoric man had a better sight than ours, or if he was wont to climb up the mountains to examine the nearest stars, or if the atmosphere of past ages was purer than ours? This problem arises from the fact that we see from below only seven of the stars of the Pleiades and that the last three stars can only be seen by ascending to the highest summits, while there have just been discovered stones dating from prehistoric times upon which the ten stars are engraved. This interesting question in astronomy and archaeology has been broached to the French Academy of Sciences by M. Bigourdan.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

The almost bankrupt broker was eating his meagre meal—the cheapest the seedy restaurant afforded—when he noticed that the waiter was an erstwhile colleague on the Street. "Great Heavens, George!" he exclaimed, "has it come to this?" George gave his one-time pal a frosty glance. "I wait here, Bill," was his reproving rejoinder; "I don't lunch here."

A man subject to epileptic seizures was picked up unconscious on the streets of New York and rushed to a hospital, and when they took off his coat one of the nurses found a piece of paper pinned to the lining, upon which was written: "To inform the house surgeon that this is just a case of plain fit—not appendicitis. My appendix has already been removed twice."

An American tourist was very anxious to visit a Turkish harem while he was in the East. He expressed his wish to a high Turkish official with whom he was on friendly terms. The official pondered for awhile. "It would be very hard to manage," he finally said. "You see, there is only one harem that I, at least, know of. And unfortunately that belongs to a Frenchman."

The aviator's wife was discovered in tears by her chum. "What is the matter, my dear?" she inquired. Between sobs the aviator's wife explained. "I am so worried about James. I asked him to kill our cat and he took her up in his plane. He said he'd take her up two thousand feet and drop her out." "Well?" the friend patiently queried. "Well!" sobbed the frantic wife, "there's the cat and James has been gone two hours."

A typical example of French wit and tact is the story told of Grevy, a former French president. Grevy was being shown the studio of an eminent English painter and was luckless enough to express an unflattering opinion of a painting. "What a daub!" he exclaimed. "Whose is it?" "That picture, M. Grevy," the unhappy artist answered, "is my own work." "Ah!" said the French president, without any sign of the chagrin that enveloped him. "In my country we always run down anything we wish to buy." And with unswerving aplomb he completed the purchase of the daub.

Barney Barnard is responsible for the story of the Gentle who bought a packet of cigarettes from Mr. Isaac Isaacstein, his regular tobacconist. "Isaac," said the customer, after the purchase had been completed, "you gave me a bad shilling in my change the other night." "Impossible," answered Isaac. "I never took or gave a bad coin away in my life. With my forty years' experience in handling money, I can tell by the touch at once; physical instinct, my boy. I suppose you managed to get rid of it?" "Yes," was the reply. "I have just paid it to you for these cigarettes."

Mr. Max Eastman gives the following classic anecdote in his "The Sense of Humor" as an example of "practical humor": "Cicero tells us how his friend Nasica avenged himself upon a Roman gentleman by the name of Ennius, upon whom he paid a call. He had been informed by the maid that Ennius was not at home; and when it came about that Ennius called upon him, he stuck his head out of the window and said, 'I am not at home.' 'What are you talking about?' said Ennius. 'Don't I know your voice?' 'Why, you rascal,' said Nasica, 'I believed your maid when she told me you were not at home, and you won't believe me even when I tell you myself.'"

Three detectives were shadowing a Frenchman who had pocketed some goods from a counter, and whom they suspected to belong to a gang. After rounding a corner they found he was no longer visible, but soon came to a restaurant with the inscription—"Ici on parle français." "He'll be in there," said the first. "No," said the second, "if he thought he was being followed he would avoid going where he thought we should expect to find him." "Yes," said the third, "but he would guess we should be smart enough to think of that, and would turn in after all." So they went in and searched, but without success, for the Frenchman could not read, and therefore had not stopped.

This is one of Irvin Cobb's favorites: In Paducah there was a husky negro named "Bull" Shackelford who ruled the black belt by a combination of brawn and intimidation. One day there got off a boat a little yellow ducky, a stranger, who had some reputation as a prize-fighter. Into a saloon he went and ordered refreshment. As he was pulling off a bill from an enormous roll to pay for it, Bull Shackelford laid a heavy hand on his shoulder. "Say, you little nigger," he bellowed;

"you've got too much dough to take care of. You just pass over that roll and I'll give you back what you orter have. Dat's de way I takes care of de niggers round here." The little ducky did not raise his eyes, but he did raise his hand, and he flicked off Bull's hand very much as he would have swept off a fly. Bull squared off and glowered. "Do you know who I is?" he demanded. "I'se the bully of this town. When I gives orders, everybody obeys." Almost without moving his position, the little ducky let go an uppercut and Bull went down. When he recovered consciousness, he looked at the little fellow long and hard. Finally he said: "Dar's just one thing I want to know and dat's all, Mister Man: Who is you, anyway?" Very solemnly the little ducky replied: "I'se de pusson you thought you was when you come in dat door."

The doctor had left his instructions sufficient to carry on during his absence through the afternoon. All went well till the phone rang and a sweet feminine voice inquired, "Is the doctor in? May I speak to him?" The assistant per instructions explained the doctor's absence and inquired if he could be of any use. The lady caller's voice was worried as she went on. "Oh, I am so sorry, I am phoning for Mrs. Blank and it is very important. Tell the doctor immediately on his return that Mrs. Blank is having a gymkhana coming on and she wonders if he could do anything for it." The assistant made a hurried note and reassured his caller. "I'll tell the doctor as soon as he returns. And meanwhile tell her to put a mustard poultice on it and renew every two hours."

THE MERRY MUSE.

A Friendly Arctic.

The Arctic is a friendly place,
Says Mr. Stefansson,
Although for nearly half the year
The night is never done;
But you get used to it in time
And really think it fun!

In summertime mosquitoes bite
With energy and vim,
And frequently in winter days
You freeze each separate limb;
But things like that, says Stefansson,
Seem friendly-like to him!

You live on seal-meat and on fat,
Which is delicious fare,
And now and then you feed, perhaps,
Upon a polar bear.
(Unless, of course, he feeds on you—
Which sometimes happens there!)

You float around on cakes of ice
Through wild and frigid seas,
While your thermometer reveals
Some sixty-five degrees
Below the well-known zero mark—
Excuse me, if you please.

For though to Mr. Stefansson
Such weather may seem fine,
And though the Arctic be his friend
I casually opine
That if the Arctic's like he says,
It aint no friend of mine.

Pseudo-Psychology.

Suicide may or may not be a frequent result of absorption in the doctrines associated with the name of Sigmund Freud, says the Independent and Weekly Review. The harm that is done by their dissemination is infinitely more important as affecting the thousands who continue to live than the few here and there whom it may perhaps drive to self-destruction. Nor does the word "dismal" begin to express the actual effect of that pernicious teaching. Lowering, degrading, besmirching, covering with slime what normally thinking persons hold in admiration and reverence—that is the real evil, in comparison with which all else is trifling. And, so far from all this being the tragic result of a recognition of scientific truth, it springs from the exploitation of a theory based on a grotesquely inadequate foundation, condemned by scientists of the highest standing as the outcome of bad logic and unscientific thinking, and, in so far as it does contain an element of truth, requiring the utmost caution in its application even at the hands of persons of special training. Its popularization by glib writers and half-baked thinkers has been nothing less than a calamity to a large part of the rising generation.

In Thomas Beer's novel of the stage, "The Fair Rewards," Clyde Fitch, Charles Frohman, Arthur Hopkins, Anna Held, George Arliss, and Cyril Maude appear in their own persons. Several others appear under pseudonyms.

The MOTOR OIL FREE FROM DESTRUCTIVE "SULPHO" COMPOUNDS

Produced Under the New HEXEON Process

ADDING A NEW CHAPTER TO THE BOOK OF ACHIEVEMENT

How We Overcame the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat

DESTRUCTIVE "Sulpho" compounds are the cause of motor oils breaking down rapidly under engine heat. An enormous amount of money is annually lost through the presence of these unnecessary properties in oils.

CYCOL will save engine owners this tremendous amount of money lost through wasted oil, wasted fuel, preventable repairs, because it is free from destructive "sulpho" compounds. These have been removed by the new Hexeon Process used exclusively by us.

When your oil contains destructive "sulpho" compounds it breaks down rapidly under engine heat. Its lubricating value becomes quickly impaired. The oil film is broken and serious damage may result.

Have your crank case thoroughly flushed—not with kerosene. Use the correct grade of Cycol as shown on the Cycol Recommendation Chart. Use Associated Gasoline. Then notice the improved performance of your motor.

Vacation Booklet.

An outing guide just off the press, and giving much detailed information regarding approximately 300 summer and pleasure resorts in California and Oregon, is being distributed by the Southern Pacific Company.

The low round-trip summer excursion rates to mountain and beach resorts which went into effect April 28th on Southern Pacific lines are expected to result in heavy vacation travel.

The vacation booklet, which is attractively printed in colors and is of convenient pocket size, gives names and locations of resorts, how they are reached from stations, names of managers, accommodations provided, rates for rooms and meals, facilities for sports and amusements, and points of interest in the vicinity.

Another feature of convenience to vacationists is the grouping of resorts by localities.

Almira D. Sherwood, widow of Benjamin F. Sherwood, and mother of the late J. D. Sherwood, died at New York on April 25th. Mrs. Sherwood was eighty-four years old. Her early married life was spent in San Francisco, where she had many friends.

CURRENT VERSE.

On a Miniature.

Thine old-world eyes—each one a violet
Big as the baby rose that is thy mouth—
Set me a-dreaming. Have our eyes not met
In childhood—in a garden of the South?
Thy lips are trembling with a song of France,
My cousin, and thine eyes are dimly sweet;
Wildered with reading in an old romance
All afternoon upon the garden seat.

The summer wind read with thee, and the bees
That on the sunny pages loved to crawl:
A skipping reader was the impatient breeze,
And turned the leaves, but the slow bees read all.

And now thy foot descends the terrace stair:
I hear the rustle of thy silk attire;
I breathe the musky odors of thy hair
And airs that from thy painted fan respire.

Idly thou pausest in the shady walk,
Thine ear attentive to the fountain's fall:
Thou mark'st the flower de-luce sway on her stalk,
The speckled vergilicus ripening on the wall.

Thou hast the feature of my mother's race,
The gilded comb she wore, her smile, her eye:
The blood that flushes softly in thy face
Crawls through my veins beneath this northern sky.

As one disherited, though next of kin,
Who lingers at the barred ancestral gate,
And sadly sees the happy heir within
Stroll careless through his forfeited estate;

Even so I watch thy southern eyes, Lisette,
Lady of my lost paradise and heir
Of summer days that were my birthright. Yet
Beauty like thine makes usurpation fair.

Eighteenth Century Grip.

Amid all our sufferings from the "grip," "Russian influenza," "blitz katarrh," "Spanish influenza," "flu," et id omne genus, the name and writings of Sébastien Mercier are too much forgotten. In his picturesque "Tableau de Paris" is to be found the following passage on the "grippe," written in 1787, which might have been written today:

"Almost every year toward the middle of November occur catarrhal indispositions caused by the presence of a humid and cold atmosphere and fogs which suppress transpiration. Many die of it, but the Parisians, who laugh at everything, call these colds the 'grippe,' the 'flirt,' but the laughter three days later is himself 'gripped' by it and goes down to the grave.

"Passing from cold rooms and theatre halls to the open air makes this suppression of the transpiration almost unavoidable. The new fashion of wearing long cloaks is excellent. It gives protection against the cold. Taking good exercise is even a surer remedy. The women who are compelled to wait some time for their carriages—those charming, delicate women I see shivering along the staircases and porticoes—should consider that their pelisses are not sufficient to protect them against mishaps."

What would he have said to the abbreviated skirts of today?

Cleaning Up for Company.

Among those who look forward with eagerness to the coming of the Shriners next June—and what really alert local business man does not?—there is a growing feeling that San Francisco ought to clean up. It is an excellent idea, and one having the additional merit of originality. Our streets are rather bare and stony, in the metropolitan mode, and for that reason exhibit with startling distinctness all the waste paper and empty cigarette boxes the citizens have to contribute. The general custom seems to be just to drop things where you are when you decide to get along without them, and that habit makes more work than our street department seems organized to do. But the present agitation in favor of neatness is a little too concentrated in point of time. Why restrict cleanliness to the visit of the Shriners? Why not be clean the year around? Our general attitude in this particular too strongly resembles that of the small boy who saw no sense in washing his face on retiring because he wasn't going anywhere, nor on getting up in the morning because it didn't make him dirty to sleep. Cleanliness is a virtue in itself. Of course, it is better to be virtuous occasionally than never to be virtuous at all; but if we were really pure in heart we should endeavor to be consistent performers. This cleaning up for company is going to look as though we did it, not in order to be clean, but in order to make our guests think we are clean. That is a humbug. Anybody who will look at our streets knows we are not. But we should be. Even if it costs a little more money and is reflected in the tax rate to a small extent, there should be better provision for making San Francisco neat. It is a fair and a fine-looking city, all but that. It is acquiring some of the best examples of American architecture, constructed on a scale of dignity and even of some grandeur. It should be clean; not merely for the Shriners who are coming, but for the Shriners and all the rest of us who live here.

The Indiana Primary.

When something less than a month ago the President took Congress by the scruff of the neck in the matter of the Naval Bill and, pronto, got what he wanted, the incident was accepted as a mark of Mr. Harding's personal and political potentiality. It was taken as significant of a situation in which members of Congress must coöperate with the Administration if they would serve themselves in their constituencies. At Washington and throughout the country there was a sharp rise in Harding stock—the universal assumption being that Mr. Harding's favor would be a decisive asset in coming elections.

This theory has sustained a shock in the failure of Senator New in the Indiana primary. From the beginning of the Harding régime New has been a stalwart Administration man. He has supported vigorously all the President's suggestions and demands. Furthermore, he has stood in close personal relations with Mr. Harding, being a constant and informal visitor at the White House and presumptively a close confidant of the Administration. His defeat, therefore, under all the circumstances is sharply disconcerting to political calculations. Obviously, the Harding influence is not what it has been cracked up to be, at least in Indiana. If to be a friend and supporter of the President has not assured reelection to Senator New, it may not be so valuable an asset as has been supposed.

There are mitigating circumstances. New, while a substantial figure, is neither a brilliant nor an engaging man. His talents, while entirely respectable, are not notable. He makes no appeal to the popular imagination. Furthermore, not very far in the background there is in his personal record a domestic scandal of a kind calculated to affect his standing with elements with whom collateral as distinct from direct considerations have weight. The spectacle of an illegitimate son convicted of murder and now committed to imprisonment for life in a California penitentiary, while not discussed above a whisper in the late campaign, undoubtedly had its adverse influence. It is easy to believe that it turned some votes adversely and that it kept other voters at home. The average plain American voter is frankly regardful of the private affairs of candidates for office; and while the rule does not work consistently, it does in certain cases act decisively. We can but suspect that in the case of Senator New it has made the difference between success and failure.

It would be unfair to characterize Beveridge's success in the Indiana primary as a result adverse to the Administration. Mr. Beveridge has a record of twelve years' fairly distinguished service as a senator. He is probably the best advertised man in the State of Indiana. His personality is striking and of a kind calculated to make him known and admired by the elements antagonistic to Mr. New. He is a brilliant speaker, and after quite another method he has something of the Rooseveltian gift of appeal to what may be styled moral sentiment. This method served him well in the recent campaign, which began systematically two years or more ago. Avoiding the pending issues, and the ordinary methods of a political canvass, Mr. Beveridge set out upon a lecturing campaign. Wherever there is a women's club or other social organization in Indiana, Mr. Beveridge appeared as a platform attraction. In vibrant phrases he discussed before admiring groups, not the bonus bill or the tariff or any other controverted issue, but the good, the true, and the beautiful. Metaphorically speaking, he chuckled the women of Indiana under their more or less dimpled chins by rhetorical endorsements of the beatitudes. Thus he steered clear of political rocks while winning high favor as an æsthetic moralist. Concurrently, he found means of placating favor by declaring himself a friend and admirer of President Harding and a supporter of his policies. It was, as the result proves, a highly effective method of campaign in a state where smug unctuousness has always been a social and political asset.

A fact suggestively important is this, namely, that although feeling in Indiana in the matter of the Beveridge-New campaign has seemed to run high in recent weeks, only about 50 per cent. of the registered Republican voters took pains to appear at the primary. Thus the selection of a party candidate was made, not by the "voice of the people" or any approach to it, but by a minority vote of barely one-fourth of those who style themselves Republicans. In Indiana, as elsewhere, voters will turn out for a real election, but they will not take the trouble to attend a primary. Thus the main presumption upon which the popular primary system was based is for the hundredth time exhibited as a fallacy. Nomination by direct primary is no more the "voice of the people" than nomination under the old convention system. It comes as a result of adroit management and it has the special demerit of being without the definite responsibility that attaches to the convention method of nomination.

Tenure of Employment.

It is the social gospel of Mr. Whiting Williams, who is vice-president of a great steel concern and has passed three years as a laboring man to get the laboring man's point of view, that what labor really wants is assurance of permanent employment. He thinks the problem of industry is not wages, but the continuing job. Mr. Williams has seen a great deal and thought a great deal about this particular one of society's difficulties; but we doubt if he is on the right track. Human nature being what it is, the prospects are that a society in which every man had a tenure of employment, a vested right to work, would soon find its industry disorganized and its pantry rather bare. It would be likely to go hungry and to have to tighten its belt without, in order to contract the void within.

There are a great many industrious, conscientious, prideful workmen in the ranks of labor, who do a day's work for a day's pay because of innate rightness of character. Many of them, for lack of some mental quality such as constructive imagination or analytical power, will always remain in the ranks of labor, and it is no discredit. We can not all be officers; in spite of appearances, there were many privates in the late war. We doubt if such men, generally speaking, are the ones that fear unemployment. And perhaps they are in the majority. But there is at least a large and important minority of persons who will not work unless they fear the loss of the job. If labor had tenure of office, the workers would have to carry the slackers, at the risk of their own demoralization. That means that all industry, all society, would have to carry them. Slave labor enjoys tenure of office, and knows that because it is property the owner will feed and clothe it, and care for its progeny; but slave labor was never very valuable, never reliable, and except at the most primitive tasks has cost almost as much as it was worth, unless mercilessly driven. Men do not like to work, and only the most conscientious can make themselves do it. The rest of us would rather go fishing, and if we can not do that we prefer to come on duty late and stand about the shop for a considerable part of the day engaged in more or less elevating conversation—for which the socialists feel we should have ample leisure.

That will not feed; clothe, and shelter society, including labor itself. They have found it out in Russia. Labor there had to be drafted, and worked on the compulsory plan, and then it did not function effectively. It felt that the government, which had become its owner and driver, would probably keep it alive as long as it came to the factory every day and took a little light exercise. Even the fear of being shot did not help very much.

There is no effective way to discipline an organization except through the power of dismissal. Labor unions have striven to take that power away from employers, and wherever they have been successful, more or less demoralization has set in. Society in general has paid for it. It is the standing complaint of corporation managers and directors; whose complaints, however, do not seem to receive much sympathy from those whose ideas are sentimentalized in favor of what they call "the under dog." Now, the discipline of industrial organizations is necessary to adequate production. There are too many men that will not work unless they dread some evil consequence. Instead of greater certainty of tenure, what society really needs in industry is less certainty of it.

There is far less interest in civil service reform today than there was twenty-five years ago. The reformed civil service was in some respects an improvement, but grave doubts as to its value have arisen among persons in a position to observe how men act when they no longer fear the penalty of slacking. In the government service, perhaps what we gained in reducing the opportunity of politicians to make spoil of office was worth anything that may have been lost through added security of tenure. There may be a little less pernicious activity among postmasters than we used to have; and government will never be conducted in an ideal manner, no matter what you do to it. But in general, in the government service or in private industry, tenure of office tends strongly to make the job a nest of sweet repose. Of course, when politicians, operating on the spoils system put friends and handy men into jobs, those job-holders felt secure as long as the party was in and the boss was satisfied, and did very little work. But civil service reform, with its greater security, and its difficulties of removal, has not completely purified us, by a long shot, and even some very optimistic reformers have given up hope that it ever will. Tenure of office is not a stimulant; it is a sedative. It is industry's bromide of potassium.

The Political Complex.

Among Republicans throughout the country there has been up to the last week—and prior to the Indiana primary—a comfortable feeling that the party was safe for another period of congressional control. Nobody has sought to deny that Congress has lacked strong leadership, that it has been minus coordination, that it has been dilatory, that it has been disrespectful of executive suggestion, that it has paltered, dodged, and made little or naught of its obligations. Yet, all this admitted, there has remained the complacent unctious that the prestige of Mr. Harding would be sufficient to overcome resentment and to overwhelm opposition. Until just now, nobody has raised a doubt of Mr. Harding's widespread popularity or questioned its potency.

But the returns from Indiana, where a personal and political friend of Mr. Harding has been turned down and a verdict rendered for an ex-Progressive (albeit a "Harding man"), are disconcerting. It now seems possible that the Harding prestige has been over-appraised or that it is limited to Mr. Harding personally, lacking the power largely to aid his friends or his party. If Indiana Republicans are so heedless of the party interest that a majority of them have not troubled themselves to go to the primary polls, if a friend and counselor of the Administration gains nothing from the executive favor, may not the record in Indiana be duplicated elsewhere? These queries have set a good many members of the House of Representatives and not a few senators a-trembling for their personal and political fortunes. May it not be that the country, for all its admiration and approval of Mr. Harding, has lost faith in his party, and particularly in those who, assuming to be his partisans, have pursued courses neglectful of the party pledges and embarrassing to the President himself? In the phrase of one no longer with us, one whom many of us may not easily and would not willingly forget, "Quite likely! Quite likely!"

The Republican party in its national platform of 1920 and in pretty much all its state declarations made definite pledges to the country. It promised to correct the abuses of the Wilson administration, to restore constitutional practice, to cut out extravagances, to eliminate whimsicalities, to reduce taxation, to revise the tariff, etc. Mr. Harding has tried sincerely, intelligently, persistently to make these pledges good. But he has been thwarted and all but insulted by Congress, which has given little heed or none at all to the assurances under which it came into authority. In the Senate many Republicans have ignored their party obligations, to join blocs of one sort or another, conceived in parochial spirit and designed to promote special or local interests. In the House of Representatives there has been slackness in regard to important matters with manifest readiness to graft new extravagances upon a system already overburdened. In brief, Congress has acted badly—badly in respect of its promises, badly in regard to its immediate duties, badly with respect to the President. The country knows it, and its knowledge of the situation is exhibited in Indiana, a state notable for party loyalty. More than half the Republicans in the state exhibited either their resentment or their indifference by staying away from the primary; and a majority of those who took pains to attend the polls gave their choice to a candidate without responsibility for recent party derelictions.

It would be idle to deny or seek to disguise the fact that in this result there is a portent of Republican disaster in the elections that are immediately ahead of us. There are those—and they are many—who believe that the country, which only two years ago gave to the Republican party an overwhelming majority in Congress, is now ready to give it a sharp rebuke. Time only will tell. But at one point there can be no question. It is that a party which makes solemn promises and then fails to fulfill them can not in morals or equity complain if its mandate shall be recalled.

In recent years there has been manifest decline in the personal quality of Congress—both in the Senate and in the House. The direct primary has had something to do with it. Automatically the system prefers the charlatans, the loud-shouters, the self-seekers; and eliminates figures of higher quality. It favors the yowling politician as against the sober and responsible statesman. Another circumstance is the fact that Congress, which formerly sat less than half of a year and rarely more than a single quarter of alternate years, is now in session practically all the time. Congressional service is more exacting, more onerous than formerly, allowing little or no time on the part of the members for their relaxations or for maintenance of their personal interests. Life at Washington during the hot summer months is trying and there are many whose propensity to congressional service is not strong enough for the sacrifice that service now entails. But whatever the considerations may be, there is rapidly being lost the individual strength that once distinguished Congress, and with it the sense of obligation that made party government a concrete and dependable force. So far has the decline gone that the country very generally has come to feel a sense of distrust of Congress and of resentment against it, and to place its hope and its faith wholly upon the executive office. It is to the President, practically to the President alone, that the mind of the country now turns for its hope for good legislation, likewise in its trust for defeat of bad proposals.

President Harding is, above all other qualities, a constitutionalist. No man knows better the theory of the Constitution and no man more highly respects it. Mr. Harding knows, too, where authority in each department of the government should begin and where it should end. When he entered upon the presidency he undertook to reestablish the legislative branch of the government in its constitutional and traditional functions. He tried to get Congress to do its work—tried with intelligence and with persistence. He has failed signally. Congress has delayed, evaded, shirked. It has sought to cajole groups of voters by special and illegitimate concessions and it has put upon the President the onus of protecting the treasury and the taxpayer. One branch has passed a soldiers' bonus bill which if finally accepted would plunge the country into financial distress, and the other branch has indicated its willingness to join in this shameless raid. Only a few days ago, in an effort to cajole certain voting elements, there was passed by the House of Representatives a bill cutting our naval organization to limits below the most conservative calculations. Patience has reached its end. The President took this particular bull by its horns and enforced action essential to the nation's security. The country applauds and approves a course which illustrates that though Congress may seek to shirk its responsibilities the executive office still has the courage and the authority to hold things level.

It now becomes evident that the dependence of the country must be upon the President. Congress has abdicated responsibility. It remains for the President so far to revise his ideas and plans as to assume authority, not only over the administration of existing laws, but to a degree over new enactments. He can not, unless he shall consent to abuses of the gravest kind, be merely an executive in the sphere of national affairs—he must be a leader and a director of legislation. When Congress gives over its authority and powers, it becomes obligatory upon the President, unpleasant though it may be, to assume them. From now on we may expect President Harding to hold a firmer hand in relation to legislation. It becomes essential that he should do so to save the country from courses infinitely mischievous and demoralizing.

The unexpected result in Indiana gives new interest to primary elections on-coming in other states. The next in order is Pennsylvania, dated for the 16th of the present month—Tuesday of next week. The Oregon primaries will be held May 19th; Iowa, June 5th; Florida, June 6th; Maine and Minnesota, June 20th; North Dakota, June 28th; Texas, July 22d; Missouri, Virginia, and West Virginia, August 1st; Ohio and Wyoming, August 8th; Mississippi, August 15th; Nebraska, August 18th; California and Montana, August 29th; Nevada and Wisconsin, September 5th; Arizona, Massachusetts, Michigan, Vermont, and Washington, September 12th; New York, September 19th; New Jersey, September 27th. Dates have not yet been set for primary elections in other states.

Germany and Justice.

Notenkraker, of Amsterdam, depicts France with a knife, about to slay Germany, "the goose that lays the golden eggs." The only defects of Notenkraker's cartoon are that, first, France is not about to slay Germany, and second, Germany refuses to lay.

Instead of laying the golden eggs she owes, Germany is running to fat. She has issued up to last March 123,457,000,000 marks in inconvertible notes, which, although legal tender, have fallen from a gold value of 23.8 cents to less than a third of a cent. The budgetary deficit has grown from 49,000,000,000 marks in 1919 to 190,000,000,000 in 1921. There appears to be no effort at economy—merely a lot of talk about it. She owes France 218,000,000,000 marks, and so far from killing the goose that lays the golden egg by pressing for payment, France has already consented to a reduction of the bill by 20 per cent. Still Germany does not pay, but adopts every shameless shift and evasion the German governmental mind can conceive, which is saying much. There is all sorts of evidence that Germany is jumping into bankruptcy to defraud her creditors. Her government is extravagant, and loose about the collection of possible revenues. On the state railroads the fares are ridiculously low. In France a railway journey of 100 kilometres costs $1.75, and in Germany only 38 cents. The per capita tax in Germany is less than a third the per capita tax in France. If the German goose ever laid a golden egg, where is it? It is not likely that Germany will be crushed; but she would be of about as much use to her creditors crushed as she is now, or as she ever intends to be.

It is necessary to keep these plain elementary things in mind, throughout the confusion of thought about reparation installments, falling marks, chaotic exchange, balances of trade, and all the other phases of international put-and-take with which we are daily invited to distract our attention from the main issue. Some commentators insist that the important thing is the rehabilitation of Germany, for the sake of the financial effect on the rest of the world. It is not. Man is not altogether a financial animal. He has some other aspirations than the commercial, and some feelings that he can not endure having outraged. One of the interests of men, at least of Western men, is justice, and perhaps it is the highest and deepest and holiest of all. That feeling is outraged by the condition Germany has been permitted to set up. There should be no further diminution of the reparations bill, and France should have her due.

Private War.

Again San Francisco has become the battle ground of private war. A strike has been called against the companies operating taxicabs, and violence has occurred, as it is likely to do when a vote-hunting government fails to enforce the law for fear of offending one or the other party to a feud. Committees known as "wrecking crews," a phrase which in this sense is a reproach to our social order, are indulging in crime with apparent confidence in their impunity. Machines have been wrecked, at this writing one has been stolen and burned, and in the effort to prevent industry being carried on except by permission of criminals, the lives of passengers have been jeopardized and one non-union driver has been shot while resisting abduction.

About this state of affairs the community needs to recognize two things: first, that it shames San Francisco and brings it into bad repute as a place to invest capital or engage in business—a condition we have so long endured that we had lost the conception of what the city might become under law and order, and had only recently begun to get it back; and second, that every time these methods "win" the public loses—its cost of living is increased, and the initiative of its people is discouraged by an artificial addition to the risks of investment. That was always the effect of private war, and civilization could not begin its modern advance until that sort of conflict was suppressed by courageous government.

Such government we are entitled to, and such we might have if we had character in the mayor's office. It is useless to blame the police force or the police commission. They can not be expected to rise higher than their official source. We have a charter under which responsibility for the good conduct of the city is concentrated in its chief executive. One straight word with the bark on from the mayor would go far to end this lawlessness, and it would bring to his support the sympathy and perhaps on occasion the votes of a wearied and disgusted public. But we do not expect Mr. Rolph to say it. He is a fair Civic Centrist and a fluent platform peddler of platitudes and bad verse, but when it comes to a disagreeable duty, or one involving a measure of political risk, he fails to rise to the level of his obligations.

The Argonaut is not "taking sides" in this matter, except the public side. It is authoritatively informed that the main trouble has not been made by the former drivers for the companies, but by the so-called "pirates," owners of single machines, whose competition with the larger companies, when it is legitimate, is altogether for the public benefit and ought to be encouraged; for no city owes less to its taxicab companies. Their charges are extortionate, with the result that their business and the service they render is less than half what it should be. Meters show it. The average run of a San Francisco taxicab is about forty miles a day, while in Chicago it is 110 to 120. On the other hand, representatives of the companies have declared that they have at least twice been brought under pressure at the City Hall to increase wages beyond a proper working limit and take it out of the public in the shape of higher charges. Again it is the public that pays. No government with the real welfare of the city at heart would ever have pursued such a policy. The present taxicab rates in San Francisco fill visitors with disgust, and make residents that are familiar with the tariffs walk or take street-cars. If the taxicab companies here were managed by real business men they would resist such pressure, arrange lower rates, with lower wages and a percentage to the drivers, and do a tremendous business such as their colleagues in New York and Chicago enjoy. The drivers would make as much or more, the public, resident or visiting, would have respectable service, and a curse would be removed from the city's reputation. But they don't do it, and until they do they are not entitled to any particular sympathy.

Neither do we believe that strikes should be suppressed. Workmen should have the right to strike every time they feel like it, and enjoy everything they can make out of it lawfully. That is in the interest of the public, whose greatest interest of all is liberty. But one of the public's vital interests also is security of life and property; and a government which can not in ordinary times assure that to every man, woman, and child is a pusillanimous and nearly worthless thing. Mayor Rolph should suppress this lawlessness, no matter what it may cost him in votes when he runs for office next time. If he can not do it, he is not fit to be mayor again, to say nothing of ever being governor.

Editorial Notes.

Miss A. Maude Royden, England's first woman minister, says of flappers that if they will only take up religion, religion will have the greatest revival of its history. They may do it yet; they appear to have tried about everything else.

Word comes from Los Angeles that the county dungeon is so crowded with bootleggers there is no room for the regular burglars, embezzlers, arsonists and homicides, who might well repeat together the old demand, "Get out of our jail!" When this occurs in the city of chemical purity, what chance has an old-line professional in an ordinary town?

In the past fiscal year California contributed the tidy sum of $216,527,924.49 to the government revenues, or 4.031 per cent. Of the total, $180,306,894.61 was on internal revenue accounts; $19,034,485.20, postal account; $9,272,061.34, customs revenues; $7,914,483.24, miscellaneous receipts. Now, having shown what California paid into the treasury, let us see what she got out of it. The figures aggregate $98,649,002.75, under the following heads: Reclamations, $87,192.51; Indian service, $308,258.29; interest payments on bonds held by corporations and individuals, $40,353,753.31; War and Navy Department (public works), $27,151,788.66; miscellaneous, $6,423,331.93. Contrasting the totals of what California yields to the government with what she gets from it, we discover that California receives far less than half of her money back.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

No Reason Why Not.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In most of the country towns of California a long-felt want has been supplied recently, the rest room—dressing room for the use of farmers' families coming into town.

San Francisco is sadly in need of such public conveniences, having but one, located in the Ferry building. Some such provisions should be made at once in the downtown shopping district. We expect soon 300,000 Shriners and families, besides twice as many Coast visitors.

It seems as imperative to arrange for these retiring rooms, just now, as to make San Francisco a spotless town.
J. B. CLIFFORD.

A Pertinent Inquiry.

RIVERSIDE, CAL., May 8, 1922.
TO THE EDITOR—Sir: "I see b' th' pa-apers," as Mr. Dooley used to say, that our Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, says that (among other things) "the inviolability of contract must be guaranteed by Russia" before any nation can safely undertake trade relations with her.

Why pick on Russia? Is a contract of any more value here in California than it is in Russia?

For many years we were the owners of a large orchard in a community of some two thousand people, and were directors in the water company supplying the water to this community and some four thousand acres of land. This was a mutual water company, owned by the users of water.

This water company owned many acres of water-bearing land, where it had many wells. It owned a steam plant where it manufactured electricity, and this electric power was carried to the various wells. The water thus pumped was taken in canals and pipe lines some forty miles and there distributed to the orchards.

We had operated this system for some years when a large power company entered the field, and after a long time spent in negotiations the water company entered into a five-year contract with this power company to buy power from them at a specified price. We therefore closed down our own power plant and during the life of the contract had very satisfactory service from the power company.

When the five years had expired, after long negotiations we entered into a contract with this same power company for a period of ten years. This power company, having served us for five years, knew our requirements as well as we did. It was a purely voluntary contract on both sides and was considered fair to both parties. Upon entering into this ten-year contract we, the water company, dismantled our power plant and sold our transmission lines to the power company. Shortly after this was done the power company took the matter of rates up with the railway commission of this state, and although the ten-year contract just entered into was satisfactory to both ourselves and the power company, and at the time of its execution had the tacit consent of the commission, the commission set aside our contract and raised the rates.

Having dismantled our plant and sold our transmission lines, we were not in the same position we were in when we entered into the contract, and so far as we could see there was nothing for us to do but accept the ruling. It has been my observation that contracts were of no force between individuals or corporations on one side and cities or public utilities on the other. I was brought up in the old school that a contract was a contract and the very cornerstone of business, but it seems I was wrong and I would be glad if you could enlighten me and tell me "why is a contract" and why we should be so insistent on other nations observing it when we do not find it necessary to do so ourselves.

Respectfully,
HENRY B. CHASE.

SOME RESULTS IN ONTARIO.

Political Development and Operation of Power Projects Is a Mess, and the Rural Population Is Shrinking.

Getting something for nothing will never lose its appeal for the general run of human beings; and there are a great many who think it good policy to try it. They buy lottery tickets hopefully. They become hypnotized by inventions for producing perpetual motion. They suppose government to be either a divine or a magical thing, mysteriously endowed with wisdom and administrative talents greater than those of the politicians of whom it is composed. They believe they could share in the profits of private business if it could only be made public business, and conducted by a wonder-working appointive commission, instead of by the men whose vision and diligence developed it.

In this state a great many farmers are being led to believe that they could get electric energy for running their pumps and farm machinery at cost—that is, at no charge for private profit—if the state conducted hydro-electric development and production. And there are people in our cities who suppose that they can get cheaper energy, and that the farmers can be made more prosperous that way.

Fortunately we have an example of the way it works out. The California Water and Power Act, so-called, an "initiated" proposal to amend the Constitution of California so that a commission yet to be appointed may have half a billion dollars, raised by mortgaging the state, to develop hydro-electric energy, has had a predecessor in the province of Ontario, Canada, where farmers were also promised power at cost. This scheme of government ownership and operation in the hydro-electric field in Canada is now about twelve years old. The farmers have not been helped materially, although the city users of energy have been charged more for power so that agriculture could have it for less, and there are in the rural districts of the province today 100,000 fewer people than there were when this socialistic experiment began. Less than 1 per cent. of the energy generated has been sold to the farmers, and a legislative commission, holding one of those "investigations," or inquests, which have to follow failures of this sort, reported in part: "The luxuries and conveniences which electric light and power bring to a home would do much to induce our native-born country boys to remain upon the farm, but unfortunately under the conditions of service at cost, the price of electricity is prohibitive for agriculture in general."

The city manager of Pasadena said when the measure was before the Santa Monica meeting of the League of California Municipalities, a convention of office-holders, last September:

We have the splendid example of the Toronto hydro-electric system which was put into operation in 1912 and has increased very rapidly until today it is serving many municipalities with electrical energy at very low rates. This proves the feasibility of the proposed development by the State of California.

But to the people who have had twelve years experience of this sort of state socialism the thing does not seem quite so "splendid." Socialism in Russia, socialism in North Dakota, socialism in Ontario, looks better before than after taking.

Addressing the federation of business men's associations at Toronto last March, Premier E. C. Drury, himself an advocate of public ownership, told of the growth of the Chippewa project, which the Ontario Power Commission had undertaken to develop for $10,500,000, to a cost of $65,000,000, and declared no business man would tolerate such estimates, with costs rising without justification, and with the suspicion behind them that they were intended to induce the public "to take up a project which otherwise they might be chary about taking up."

One instance of the sort might have been owing to bad calculations. Two would indicate that such calculation was inseparable from the nature of projects so conceived. And up in the northwest section of the province, at Nipigon, is the second instance. The people of Fort William and Port Arthur were promised cheaper power from a development to cost somewhere between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000. They were paying $15 a horsepower year, under private ownership, to a corporation which had, we presume, "grabbed" a power site or so. The new development has already cost $6,300,000 and is not complete, and the people of Port Arthur are paying about $21 a horsepower year, which is "cost." These are some of the "splendid" results the politicians promise. The mayor of Berkeley says the province of Ontario has successfully solved this problem. A few more problems solved with equal success would strongly resemble ruin.

The premier of Ontario says:

Under the scheme of "power at cost" the capital cost must bear the interest charge until the consumption overtakes it. In Port Arthur the interest charge is not half met by the cost of the power sold. The remainder of the interest charge is added to the capital account; so that each year, without a bit of work being done upon the development the capital cost mounts up by about $300,000. It is the old scheme. I be-here that in private promotions it is described as making the dog eat his tail until he gets something else to feed upon. It is probably a sound method, and it is certainly the only way in which these charges can be met unless the province as a whole is to absorb the loss. But, Mr. Chairman, if the dog has to feed upon himself until he has not only eaten his tail, but also half of his body, he becomes a comparatively worthless dog; and that is exactly what we fear for the Nipigon power project, built ahead of the requirements of its power market.

There could hardly be a better example of a dog eating himself than the California Water and Power Amendment contemplates; for it seeks to provide that if the projects to be developed can not meet interest charges in any other way, more money may be borrowed to pay the interest on the money borrowed already. This is eating the dog right up to the bark.

The Nipigon project was not studied out by business men, but by a political commission. To justify itself, which is a temptation to every such body, it built ahead of the demand. The California scheme contemplates no check against such a blunder, but gives the proposed commission unlimited power to define projects and start them wherever it wishes. It does not even have to confine itself to California, but can go into Arizona and perhaps into Mexico, if the grass looks good, and develop energy for Southern California at the expense of the rest of the state. If the development won't pay the interest, more bonds may be sold for that purpose, and if nobody will buy them money for both interest and principal is appropriated, by the Constitution so that the legislature shall have no check on it, from the state treasury, and the tax collectors are directed to collect it in addition to the other revenues. Poor doggie!

Only the most favorably situated farm districts have thus far been served in Canada, after twelve years, and the legislative committee investigating the subject declared that any general extension of farm service under the system prevailing at the time of its report would mean that the cost of power to the agricultural industry would be at least double the cost of power to other industries and to urban municipalities. Distribution costs more in the country, because of the separation of the customers and the greater length of transmission required. "Power at cost" would mean power at prices prohibitive to the farmer.

But in California the farmers are now getting their power at less than cost, and they have not had to bond the state for half a billion either. It is simply recognized by the hydro-electric companies that the cities can afford to make up the difference, since farming is the industry on which all other industries are based, and on which the growth of the cities depends. If the rural delivery routes had to pay their own way they could not do it. "Power at cost" to farmers is a delusion. Getting power for nothing, or without profit, is also a delusion. We shall pay in the rates or in taxes. When we consider the contrast between political and business administration the prospects seem good for paying in both ways.

The writer was coming down the cañon of the Feather River recently and pointed out to an Eastern woman a hydro-electric power dam diverting the water by a ditch leading to a power house. The visitor had heard a great deal about the voracious power-site grabbers of the West, and was duly incensed at the awful spectacle before her eyes. Farther down stream, the water all came back again, and from that point on there was as much in the river as there ever had been. She was greatly puzzled. And disappointed. It didn't look wicked at all. Finally she said: "I thought they stole the water, but they just borrow it when nobody else wants it. I don't really see much harm in that."

One of the difficulties in dealing with this project is its vagueness. It is vague because it is limitless in the grant of authority. It is a blind gift of money and power. No such proposal was ever made in this state before, and the writer can recall none like it in any other state. We now have a bonded debt of about $75,000,000, exceeded by but two states in the Union: New York and Massachusetts. The addition of this half-billion would raise the debt of California to about 45 per cent. of the debt of all the states combined. Nobody knows who is going to spend the money, nor for what in particular. The only thing known about it is who is going to pay it. It will be paid by all the taxpayers of California—not merely, as at present, by those who use power.

The worst feature of the project, however, is not the money cost involved, but the political cost. It is revolutionary. It is socialism, which never works except in dreams and visions. It has received its most important support thus far from the League of California Municipalities, an organization of office-holders. Office-holders like to extend the system of office-holding, to multiply commissions and extend governmental function. They take to it naturally. The more offices, the better chance for their class at power and emoluments. Many of them, of course, sincerely believe that they can promote the general welfare in this manner; and they are the more dangerous for their sincerity. But sincere or not, they are almost a unit for the socialization of the power industry of California. If they succeed, it will be but the beginning. We shall have started on the North Dakota road, and the Non-Partisan League will be delighted. MORTON TODD.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

George Tchitcherin, the leader of the Russian Soviet group at Washington, and foreign minister under Lenin, is one of the few Russians now in authority who were in high office under the Czar.

Arthur James Balfour, now Earl of Balfour, rarely reads a newspaper. He is said by a writer in the Forum to be "calm, mellow, learned, wise, experienced," and to have filled the office of prime minister with philosophical indifference and a cynical doubt as to whether it was worth the trouble. He is fond of reading "penny dreadfuls" of the Old Sleuth type.

Joseph Pennell, the American etcher, finds a kindred spirit in Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, novelist, essayist, and professor of English literature at Cambridge University. "Q" has declared long since that art is incompatible with prohibition. Mr. Pennell now comes forward with the definite announcement that "no nation ever produced and maintained art without freedom of thought such as drink implies" and "you can not have good art or good literature without wine."

Lord Birkenhead, who used to be "Gallop Smith," is the youngest lord chancellor on record, and it is said the woollack has rarely had so brilliant an occupant. He commands a sharp, flexible wit, and a thorough understanding of elementary principles, legal or political. He is the intimate friend of Winston Churchill, is very ambitious, and has developed of late a rare and moving eloquence, in contradistinction to the cross-examining style of the days when he was Mr. F. E. Smith, K. C., M. P. It was once said of him that he seldom neglected a duty and never a pleasure. He wants to be prime minister.

Frederick Andrews, who died recently in Yorkshire, England, was one of the last of the great head masters of English schools. For forty-two years he was master of Ackworth, the famous Quaker educational establishment founded by John Fothergill in Yorkshire in 1779. Although a weakness of the eyes prevented his studying for a higher degree than his B. A., which he took in London in 1872, he was a marvelous cricket player. It is said that 1328 boys and girls passed under his tuition and every one liked him. He was just and sympathetic in private relations, and a strong Liberal in politics, and while no orator, nobody could hold either friendly or hostile audiences better.

Sir Robert Horne, "the man behind the pound sterling," who became chancellor of the exchequer early last year, is the son of a Scottish minister, and was educated at Glasgow. He taught metaphysics in a Welsh university, but returned to Scotland, where, when the war broke out, he was said to be the leader of the Scottish commercial bar. During the war he served in the admiralty, and attracted the attention of Lloyd George, who induced him to become minister of labor. He handled the biggest two coal strikes on record. As chancellor of the exchequer he is accomplishing great administrative economies and doing miracles to bring the pound back to par. He is said to have the confidence of the House of Commons in his mastery of intricate financial detail.

General Wu Pei Fu represents the old Chinese aristocracy and has modern liberal views. He passed his literary examinations in the old Chinese style when he was twenty-one, and then received a military education in the Kai Ping Military Academy, whence he was graduated with honors. He took a leading part in the attacks on the military coalition of two years ago, when the Anfu Club was broken up and its leaders were imprisoned. His military education appears to have been quite practical, for he is a successful leader. In 1921 he attacked the Hunan rebels and drove them out of Hupei back into their own territories. At Ichang he outflanked the Szechuan forces, which were acting independently of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, and crushed them through a strategic operation which was praised by American observers as the finest ever employed by a modern Chinese general. It is said that this victory saved the republic from disintegration.

The Hon. Albert J. Beveridge, who defeated Senator New recently in the Republican senatorial race in Indiana, has served twelve years in the Senate with distinction as a constructive legislator. He lost his seat in 1911 through one of the periodical party sweeps that brought the Indiana Democrats back into power. Incidentally, Mr. New, who is a personal friend of Mr. Harding and whose friends counted therefore on his reelection, has served but one term in the Senate. His previous career was in journalism and state organization. Mr. Beveridge, on the other hand, is a lawyer. He was admitted to the bar in 1887, and was associated with McDonald & Butler until he began to practice for himself. He has been identified with many important cases and is well known as an orator and Republican campaign speaker. Senator Beveridge is the author of "The Russian Advance," "Americans of Today and Tomorrow," "The Meaning of the Times," and the "Life of John Marshall."

The late Henry M. Shradly, the great sculptor of horses in action, who recently died, was engaged at the time of his fatal illness on an equestrian statue of General Robert E. Lee for the University of Virginia—a work which is to be put in place in the near future.

Mr. Shradly's modeling of horses is almost unique among sculptors. The bust of Grant unveiled by Marshal Joffre April 27th, Grant's birthday, is also the work of Henry M. Shradly. The sculptor was a son of the late Dr. George F. Shradly, editor of the Medical Record, who was a friend of General Grant and who attended him in his last illness. Henry Shradly was a graduate of Columbia University and a law student till his work as an amateur sculptor proved so successful that he became a professional artist. An example of his sincerity in his art is the fact that he became a trained soldier the better to do his work. He was an instructor in artillery during the world war. Mr. Shradly was fifty years old last October.

OLD FAVORITES.

A Forsaken Garden.

In a coign of the cliff between lowland and highland,
At the sea-down's edge between windward and lee,
Walled round with rocks as an inland island,
The ghost of a garden fronts the sea.
A girdle of brushwood and thorn encloses
The steep square slope of the bottomless bed
Where the weeds that grew green from the graves of its roses
Now lie dead.

The fields fall southward, abrupt and broken,
To the low last edge of the long lone land.
If a step should sound or a word be spoken,
Would a ghost not rise at the strange guest's hand?
So long have the grey bare walks lain guestless,
Through branches and briars if a man make way
He shall find no life but the sea-wind's, restless
Night and day.

Not a flower to be pressed of the foot that falls not;
As the heart of a dead man the seed-plots are dry;
From the thicket of thorns whence the nightingale calls not,
Could she call, there were never a rose to reply.
Over the meadows that blossom and wither
Rings but the note of a sea-bird's song;
Only the sun and the rain come hither
All year long.

The sun burns sere and the rain dishevels
One gaunt bleak blossom of scentless breath.
Only the wind here hovers and revels
In a round where life seems barren as death.
Here there was laughing of old, there was weeping,
Haply, of lovers none ever will know,
Whose eyes went seaward a hundred sleeping
Years ago.

Heart handfast in heart as they stood, "Look thither,"
Did he whisper? "Look forth from the flowers to the sea;
For the foam-flowers endure when the rose-blossoms wither,
And men that love lightly may die—but we?"
And the same wind sang and the same waves whitened,
And over the garden's last petals were shed,
In the lips that had whispered, the eyes that had lightened,
Love was dead.

Or they loved their life through, and then went whither?
And were one to the end—but what end who knows?
Love deep as the sea as a rose must wither,
As the rose-red seaweed that mocks the rose.
Shall the dead take thought for the dead to love them?
What love was ever as deep as a grave?
They are loveless now as the grass above them,
Or the wave.

Here death may deal not again for ever;
Here change may come not till all change end.
From the graves they have made may they shall rise up never,
Who have left nought living to ravage and rend.
Earth, stones, and thorns of the wild ground growing,
While the sun and the rain live, these shall be;
Till a last wind's breath upon all these blowing
Roll the sea.

Till the slow sea rise and the sheer cliff crumble,
Till terrace and meadow the deep gulfs drink,
Till the strength of the waves of the high tides humble
The fields that lessen, the rocks that shrink;
Here now in his triumph where all things falter,
Stretched out on the spoils that his own hand spread,
As a god self-slain on his own strange altar,
Death lies dead.—A. C. Swinburne.

The Chambered Nautilus.

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,
Sails the unshadowed main.—
The venturous bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purple wings
In gulfs enchanted, where the siren sings,
And coral reefs lie bare,
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.
Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
And every chambered cell,
Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,
Before thee lies revealed—
Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea.

ASIA AT THE CROSSROADS.

E. Alexander Powell Classifies the Far Eastern Question with the White Light of Mentality.

There is such a plurality of books on Asian subjects that it almost seems like playing favorites to review one rather than another. Mr. Alexander Powell's recent publication, "Asia at the Crossroads," puts forth no more plea to distinction than its fellows. In fact its author says that while the shelves of public libraries fairly sag under the weight of the Far Eastern question his only excuse is an attempt to simplify the complexity of Oriental affairs. And it is as a simplifier and an interpreter that we are interested in Mr. Powell's work. He believes in plunging in medias res, that is to say, in Japan. Mr. Powell declares himself neither a partisan of Japan of the George Gleason tribe nor yet a foe of the—there is an embarrassment of choice when it comes to foes and it is perhaps wiser not to rouse the envy of the many whose greatest pride is their enmity to the Mikado's country.

Our author gets at the crux of the situation in Japanese business principles. In fact after reading of the devious ways of Japanese merchants one is no longer surprised that the country has enemies. The only wonder is that she can find countries to trade with. But Mr. Powell shows the tolerance of a true neutral. He says:

My personal opinion is that the commercial trickery practiced in Japan is not due to any inherent dishonesty in the Japanese character, but rather to the contempt in which merchants were held in that country for centuries. Until recent years the position of the merchant in Japan was analogous to that of the Jew in the Europe of the Middle Ages. I.e. was at the bottom of the social scale. At the top was the noble; then came the samurai, or professional fighting man; followed in turn by the farmer and the artisan; and last of all came the merchant. The farmer and the artisan have always held a higher place than the merchant because they are producers, whereas the merchant was looked upon as a huckster, a haggler, a bargainer, who made his living by his wits. As a result, business was in the hands of a low class of Japanese. Trading was regarded as beneath the dignity of a gentleman. Furthermore, the Japanese merchant has had less than seventy years in which to learn the rules of the business game as it is played in the West. Coming from a despised and down-trodden class, is it any wonder that in that brief span he has not wholly eradicated his ancient methods, that he has not yet acquired all our Western virtues and ideals? The Jew has been under the influence of the West for two thousand years, yet his business ethics are not always beyond reproach. Let us, then, be charitable in judging the Japanese.

It may be that business trickery in the Japanese is not due to inherent dishonesty, but one strongly suspects that it is due to the inherent and inevitable subtlety of the Japanese character. Again, the wonder is that they do not see how short-sighted a policy they are pursuing. But with them subtlety is not so much a means to an end as an end in itself. Witness their form of government, which Mr. Powell thus interestingly exposes for the benefit of the uninitiate:

To begin with, you must understand that Japan is nominally governed by a constitutional government, consisting of a cabinet, a legislative assembly known as the Diet, and a civil bureaucracy composed of the chiefs of the various administrative departments and their subordinates. This is the government with which the world is familiar. But there is also an invisible government, an unseen empire, composed of a clique of officers holding high rank in the army and navy, certain statesmen with military sympathies and affiliations, and a few representatives of big business and finance. The constitutional government functions through the cabinet, and, in its relations with foreign nations, through the foreign office, being represented abroad by regularly accredited ambassadors, ministers, and consuls. The invisible government functions through the general staff, its activities abroad being carried on by a great number of secret agents, whose identities can only be guessed at, and by the military attachés attached to the various embassies and legations, who, though ostensibly under the orders of their respective ambassadors and ministers, are, in reality, answerable only to the general staff. Japanese policy, particularly in foreign affairs, is invariably shaped by this unseen government, whose wishes are generally translated into action by the constitutional government, on which it is able to exert powerful pressure. The two governments, whose interests are by no means always opposed, are of necessity more or less closely correlated, like interlocking directorates.

The foregoing elaborate arrangement seems to us to denote a marked talent for diplomacy of the old style. One hears a lot about the new diplomacy, probably in Japan as elsewhere, but the old diplomacy—that is to say, the genuine variety—seems to hold its own with a tenacity that only bona-fide diplomacy is capable of. The Japanese have evidently as pronounced a penchant for diplomacy as the late German nation had for militarism. Only the Oriental race combines the two in a truly Oriental paradox. Our author continues:

I have said that, according to the terms of the constitution, the emperor is supposed to exercise the executive power with the advice and assistance of his cabinet. But between the cabinet and the crown stand a rapidly diminishing body of men who are known as the Genro, or Elder Statesmen. This sacred and secret inner circle, as at present constituted, has only two members: Marquis Saionji and Marquis Matsukata. This duumvirate of old men is the mentor and mouthpiece of divinity itself; they, with Field Marshal Ueyehara, the chief of the general staff, constitute the occult power which hedges the imperial throne; they are the real rulers of Japan.

It has always been thought that the British government had an ideally simple mechanism, especially when cabinet breaking and making was concerned. But for sheer artless mechanical perfection, commend us to the Japanese. This is their technique:

The procedure followed by the military party in wrecking a cabinet is as simple as it is effective. If it does not approve of the cabinet's policy, the Genro and the chief of the general staff send for the minister of war and tell him to resign. The premier, who, as I have already explained, is limited by law in his selection of a successor to the retiring minister, offers the portfolio in turn to one after another of the small group of army officers who, by virtue of their rank, are eligible to accept it under the provisions of the constitution. Having been coached in advance by the chief of the general staff, each of them politely declines. Thereupon the prime minister is compelled to admit his inability to complete his cabinet. In Japan such an admission is tantamount to withdrawal from public life, whereupon the emperor offers the vacant premiership to some statesman more willing to accept the dictation of the militarists.

The more one studies the foregoing system, the more admirable it becomes. Of course one is speaking from a purely Machiavellian, amoral viewpoint. Doubtless it has its vicious side. Our author quotes Professor Yoshino:

"Of course this scheme of double government is not constitutional. It ought to be easily broken up. As a matter of fact, in the government itself, certainly in the present cabinet and among the people, the opposition to this scheme is very strong and very pronounced. But it is very difficult to be undertaken. The stronger the opposition among the people becomes, the stronger the opposition of the militarists. Their whole attitude is that whatever is best for Japan is the thing that is to be done, no matter who or what is sacrificed. Their aim is to make Japan powerful and to insure her influence as a nation. If that means that China or Korea is to be sacrificed, it is unavoidable."

But it is only fair to Japan to remember that she is a very old country whose peculiar conservative temperament has crystallized all the vices of the ages and whose land and government are badly in need of house-cleaning. Every argument has two sides, and here is Japan's:

With emigration to America and Australia out of the question, the nation is faced, then, by three alternatives: (1) a reduction of the birth rate; (2) an increase in food production; (3) territorial expansion into the thinly populated regions of Eastern Asia. As a reduction of the birth rate is not to be expected, and as food production in Japan itself has already reached the maximum, Japanese statesmen have been compelled by sheer economic necessity to adopt the third alternative—expansion on the Asian mainland. There you have in tabloid form the true expansion of Japan's political and military activities in Shantung, Manchuria, Mongolia, and Siberia and her claims to "special interests" in all those regions. In short, Japan has reached the point where she must overflow or perish, just as the congested countries of Europe overflowed into the Americas and Africa. But in her case there is no New World, no Dark Continent, in which her surplus millions can find homes and livelihoods. The waste lands were long ago parceled out among the Western nations. Japan came into the world a century too late. Debarred from expanding to the eastward or the southward, she is expanding westward into the loosely held, thinly peopled, undeveloped fringes of China and Siberia. That her expansion should be at the expense of other and weaker nations is unfortunate but, under the circumstances, unavoidable. As a Japanese writer in the World's Work has put it: "The Japanese people must either die a saintly death in righteous starvation, or expand into the neighbor's backyard—and Japan is not that much of a saint."

The masses in Japan are very poor. An immense step toward the democratizing of the country was taken when recently the tax franchise was greatly reduced:

The astonishing increase in the number of qualified voters effected by a reduction of six dollars in the tax franchise provides a striking illustration of the dire poverty of the Japanese masses. Even more astonishing, from a Western viewpoint, is the utter indifference to the franchise displayed by both the voting and the non-voting population. The truth of the matter is that the great mass of the people are too heavily burdened with taxation, too busily engaged in the struggle for the bare necessities of life, to concern themselves with politics. This explains why there is almost no public opinion, as we understand the term, in Japan. Though, under the provisions of the constitution, the Japanese taxpayer has a voice in the government of the country, he is seldom able to raise it above a whisper.

It is too bad, when one is trying to see eye to eye with the Japanese, that they should cause us a violent political stigmatism by their discriminatory laws. It is hard to believe with Mr. Powell that they see "nothing anomalous" in the situation described below. One suspects that their inherent subtlety is again on the job and that it is not that they see "nothing anomalous," but that they short-sightedly hope we will be conveniently dense:

The Japanese see nothing anomalous in the fact that their own laws prohibiting Chinese from settling in Japanese territory are fully as rigid as the restrictions placed on Japanese immigration into the United States. Indeed, they have carried their exclusion policy to far greater lengths than we have ours, for unskilled foreign laborers are not permitted to settle in those regions on the Asian mainland which, though they do not belong to Japan, are under Japanese control. In other words, a Chinese coolie can not settle in the Chinese province of Shantung, because, forsooth, Japan regards it as within her own sphere of influence. The subjects of the emperor admit of no inconsistency in the fact that, though approximately 27,000 acres are owned by Japanese settlers in California, not a single foot of Japanese soil can be owned by a foreigner. They fail to recognize anything anomalous in the fact that, though nearly 48,000 acres in California are owned by American corporations controlled by Japanese capital, very few, if any, foreigners are represented in corporations holding land in Japan. There are, it is true, a few foreigners in Japan who hold land under perpetual leases, but these holdings, insignificant in number and extent, have come down from the days when the Western nations exacted extraterritorial privileges. As a people, the Japanese are not blessed with a sense of humor. If they were, they would see the humor of their insistence on being accorded the same rights which they deny to another Oriental race, the Chinese.

The Japanese are a superior people mentally, but they make the mistake of thinking themselves unique. The Orient has not a monopoly on logic—nor even on subtlety. The Japanese think that they have a corner on all the more complicated forms of thinking. We think that Mr. Powell does not give them credit for their native sagacity, and he certainly gives them credit for more naïveté than we do.

Passing from the always troubled waters of the Japanese question, Mr. Powell turns to Korea. He nails our attention immediately by an extraordinary analogy. We have to take his word for it, as we know nothing about Korea:

Korea is the Ireland of the East. The more I consider the comparison the better I like it, for between the two countries, one on the eastern edge of the Old World, the other on the western, there is a most singular and striking analogy. Ireland is separated from the nation which is its suzerain by a narrow land-locked sea. So is Korea. Ireland is a land of surpassing beauty. So is Korea. The Irish are an agricultural people, as are the Koreans, the national industries of both being connected with the tilling of the soil. The peasantry of both countries are ignorant, simple, patient, industrious, good-natured. Both are prone to use intoxicants to excess on occasion. Both are extremely superstitious, with a terrified belief in the existence of spirits, goblins, and demons. Both are desperately poor, dwelling in wretched hovels amid filth and squalor. The Irish are turbulent and fond of intrigue. The same characteristics are found in the Koreans. The histories of both nations are punctuated by invasions, rebellions, and internecine wars. Both have been the victims of cruelty, injustice, and oppression. Cromwell's invasion of Ireland in 1649, with its accompanying massacres and systematic devastation, had its counterpart in the shocking scenes which marked Hideyoshi's invasion of Korea in the preceding century. The Irish have been held in subjection by a people of alien race and religion. The Korean still are. Irish distrust and detestation of England is equaled only by Korean distrust and detestation of Japan. Heretofore the Irish have failed to give convincing proof of their ability to maintain a just and stable government. This is likewise true of the Koreans. Most Englishmen are convinced that an independent Ireland would prove a menace to the safety of the British Empire. Most Japanese are equally convinced that an independent Korea would threaten the safety of the empire of Japan.

We should like to point out, though, in race pride, that there is a great difference. According to Mr. Powell's own version of Korea it is a corrupt and decadent land, whose wretched condition under the Japanese is even better than under native rule. It is impossible to think of Ireland as a decadent country. One is reminded of the ancient gag of the Irishwoman who when asked from whom her family sprang indignantly retorted, "I'd have ye know the Moriarty's don't spring from any one. They springs at 'em."

Throughout Mr. Powell's book there is the constant refrain of the shortsightedness of Japan. A sovereign example is their treatment of Korea—which is an improvement on Korean home rule only because nothing could have been worse than the latter. He says:
